Mr Leon Brittan, the Home Secretary, presented the Conservative Party Conference at Blackpool yesterday with measures that will ensure that about five hundred hard-core killers and violent offenders will spend extended terms in prison.

But, in a highly delicate political operation, delivered before a notoriously hardline audience, Mr Brittan managed to temper his toughness with more than a touch of mercy for non-violent offenders. That mercy could lead eventually to an overall reduction of 2,000 in the prison population, which is now 44,163.

It was a measure of the Home

In the wake of the general the general in the wake of the general the watch of merchan in the wake of the general the watch of night-watchnen, security guards, or members of post office and public transport staffs could also expect "very long periods in prison indeed". Life sentences, too, would mean life when the release of an offender would pose a risk to the public.

The decisions did not stop better. Mr Brittan also announced his intention to block parole for all those sentenced to more than five years for an offender of violence against the person or of drug trafficking, and to increase the maximum sentence for those convicted of carrying firearms in furtherance of crime from 14 years to life.

It was a measure of the Home Secretary's skill that by last night he had won the endorsement of right-wing Tory backbenchers and of Mr Robert Kilroy-Silk, the Labour chairman of the all-party Parliamentary Penal Affairs Group.

Mr Brittan failed to see Effective and purposeful policing was of prime importance, he said, but public confidence in the criminal justice system required sentence is that reflected "society's deep abhorence of violent crime".

However, at a meeting of the nine members of the executive on November 2. attended by the party agent, Miss Rose Freeman, and an official from Conservative Central Office, it was decided to go through a full selection

A short list was drawn up with three names: Mr John Maples, Mr Tony Patterson and Mr Robert Hughes. Mr Hughes, the eventual candi-date, had been asked to put his name forward by Mr Ian MacLeod, the area party chairman. Miss Keays's name was not on that initial list but was added to it after the party had interviewed between 30 and 40 potential candidates.

The judge gave him a 15-year sentence for causing grievous bodily harm to police constable Nicholas Carr with intent to resist arrest on August 5 last year, and 10 years for having two firearms with intent to resist arrest on September 15, 1982. He directed that those sentences should run consecutively.

Martin, aged 36, of Crawford Place, Marylebone, London, was also given 10 years for the theft of £25,000 from a security van in London's Cannon Street on July 29 last year, and five years for burglary at offices in Bonhill Street, City of London, between January 18 and 25 this year - both sentences to run

Earlier, in the 15-day trial a charge of attempting to murder PC Carr was dropped on the judge's direction. He described as callous Martin's threat to put a second builet into the officer. Martin showed no emotion

After the case, Martin's father, Mr Ralph Martin, said outside the court; "If I had a gun I'd go and shoot the judge myself". He said the sentences were "ridiculous"

Mr Martin had sat in the public gallery throughout the trial and when the sentences were passed today he leapt to his feet, apparently trying to snatch a glimpse of his son before he was led away. He was told by a policeman to sit down.

THE TIMES WEDNESDAY OCTOBER 12 1983

Contempt for authority led David Martin to 25-year jail sentence

When David Martin was in prison, one story relates, the guards would regularly find his cell door open in the morning with Martin lying on his bunk, gazing at the ceiling and whistling nonchalantly.

The story illustrates two important influences in Martin's life that led him to notoriety and yesterday's prison sentence of 25 years: a remark-able ability with locks and an overriding contempt for authcrime and the second, when coupled with a fascination with guns, turned him from a fleeting period into Britain's most

But Martin's sudden elevation to the front pages came not as a result of his shooting of Police Constable Nicholas Carr on his daring escape from Marylebone Magistrates' Court, but because another man, Stephen Waldorf, was mis-takenly shot by police instead of

Everyone who knows Martin agrees that he is a strange, complicated personality. The police, used to dealing with "ordinary villains", were per-plexed by his self-confessed transvetisim coupled with an months in a detention centre for pparently violent nature.

They also found it hard to understand his total disregard for his own safety. One policeman said: "I couldn't relate to him. He's a cold guy, very calculating. He's different; intriguing even".

An acquaintance, asked what pushed Martin into crime, replied: "He's got a grudge against society and he vents it

Rate system 'must be changed'

Recalling that during the Com-mons capital punishment debate he announced that those who mur-dered police officers could normally expect to serve at least 20 years, the Home Secretary said: "But those who murder prison officers are also killing people who are in the front line of the battle against crime. They too, can expect to serve at least 20 years". (Applause). No alternative had emerged as a better system than rates, which remained the least unsatisfactory local tax, Mr Patrick Jenkin, Secretary of State for the Environ-ment, said in defending the selective murderers for their part seek to destroy the very fabric of our society. They aim to secure by violence what they cannot obtain by theme of rate limitation, backed up by reserve powers for general rate capping, which he had announced in August.

The search for a workable alternative to rates had drawn a blank. The Secretary of State said half the overspend this year by local authorities was accounted for by the GLC and the six metropolitan counties. They were to be abolished, for they were a wholly unnecessary

He said radical realignment of the system was required, rather than abolition. The 1979 manifesto promised that the Conservatives would ease the rates burden. In most areas rates went on rising. The White Paper on rate capping was a start, but it was not enough.

the current system. It was beyond hope and should be replaced.

Mr Strart Dawson, Sheffield Hallam, said defiance of government directives was looked upon as a virilty symbol by Socialist-domi nated local councils. Mr Michael Davis, Chester senior manager in a large company said the Government's proposal to cap the rates was being attacked by the local government lobby on the ground that it reduced local democratic accountability, but on the accountability test the rating system failed dismally. He was not asking for a business vote but for protection for business ratepayers.

Miss Mary Lee, Wallsend, did not think the system, which was tried and tested, needed reforming. But abuses must be stopped and the

Mr Lewis Moss, Association of County Councils, said they urged the Government not to proceed with its rate capping legislation, to work to make it more fair

Mr Jenkin, replying to the debate, said the debate had been an admirable redefinition of the problem, by illustrating that agreement on any radical change was as far away as ever.

Only a few hard-line Labour councils were responsible for the really serious overspending. Souring rates cost jobs. No alternative to rates exam by the select committee of MPs had merged as a better system. In each the problems outweighed the advantages. Abolition of the worst overspenders was not by itself enough. The manifesto committed them to take powers to cap the rates, and he had rate lumination backed up by reserve powers for general rate capping.

Those who thought it unnecessary should ask the ratepayers in Speffield, Manchester, Lambeth or Islington. The ratepayers were being duty to protect people from the

In looking back to the election victory in June, Mr Gummer paid many tributes but the most tumultnous reception came from the representatives when he acknowledge the debt of gratitude the Conservative Party owed to the man who had planned and conducted the campaign, Mr Cecil Parkinson.

Mr Gummer, who is under-secretary of State for employment and MP for Suffolk, Coastal, said the party's hundredth conference was under way and they had a lot to do. The Conservative Governme was going on with the job it started in 1979

He paid tribute to the party's hard working supporters in every constituency, the professionals of the party - the agents - and all at central office, and after the applause which greeted his reference to Mr Parkinson, Mr Gummer commented: "This is a great party to belong to and I am very fortunate in the success Cecil left me.

This party is very fortunate to have so outstanding a Secretary of State".

He said the Conservative Party must prepare for the future, having laid a great foundation. At the last election they had been seen to be the party which represented all the people. They must turn those voters into members: they must get

'We will lighten tax burden'

A lower burden of taxes, leading to a simpler tax system, depended on the government's creating a climate of stability and confidence, Mr Peter Rees, Chief Secretary to the Treasury, said when replying to the opening debate on taxation. Public spending must be kept to a minimum to give the Chancellor room to meet the necessary tax objectives. The first task must be to lighten further the tax burden, which he admitted was too high. Mr Malcolm Harbour, of Solihull, had opened the debate, saying that a five-year programme of streamlining the tax system should be a high priority, along with tax Mr Harbour moved a resolution urging the Government to "simplify personal and business taxation in order to discourage tax avoidance and encourage all to earn, save and invest, as our country's prosperity depends on the efforts of our working population".

Taxation was one of the major issues facing the Government, he said. The taxation system was far too complex and was understood by very few specialists, let alone th average taxpayer or politician. Tax levels were still too high.

Liberals in turmoil as White turns on Gray

From Our Corresponde Melbourne

The decision by Mr Robin Gray, the Liberal Premier of Tasmania, to campaign for Mr Joh Bjelke-Peterson, the National Party Premier of Queensland, has caused a storm in the Liberal Party.

Mr David Rowell, president of the Liberals Tasmanian branch, said he had been placed in an embarrassing position after advising Mr Gray not to visit Queensland. He said that the political dangers of such a visit would have to be faced by Mr Gray, alone.

Mr Rowell said that Tasma-nian Liberals would be disap-pointed by Mr Gray's decision. "I have given my commitment to the Queensland Liberal Party, through their president, Dr Herron, and Mr White, that we will offer them any help."
Mr Gray's decision is particularly unfortunate because the state election, to be held on October 22, was precipitated by a split in the National-Liberal Party coalition government caused by Mr Bjelke-Peterson's refusal to allow Mr Terry White, the new Liberal Party leader, to serve in the Queensland Government. Yesterday Mr White said that Mr Gray was the "bad apple at the bottom of the political barrel." He said Mr Gray was not welcome in Queensland and

The alternatives to Stansted could prove very costly.

The why, when and whereabouts of London's third airport have been circling around for more than 20 years.

And time, that most critical of airport planning factors, is running out.

If future air traffic diverts to our competitors. we'll be waving goodbye to a good deal of foreign

Ticket sales to foreign visitors and landing fees from overseas airlines earned us £157 million last year. Countless millions more came in via incoming tourists.

In addition to the cash, there's the wealth of jobs that air travel generates. Not just in our airports but in shops, hotels, restaurants and the like.

With over 40 million passengers last year, a figure that's expected to double over the next decade, there's now an urgent need for airport development.

At the recent public inquiry, the forecasts supported an expansion of capacity in the South East. Even assuming the maximum growth for regional airports.

The air traveller will expect expansion at London too. Apart from the obvious attractions of our capital city, it offers more flights to more international destinations than anywhere else.

And if we can't cope with future demand, airline passengers will opt for our competitors across the Channel.

To hold our position on top of the world, we must develop our airport system around London. And the logical location for this development is Stansted. An airport already operating successfully. An airport with rail services nearby and with London just a short trip down the M11.

But, while waiting for the green light at Stansted, we've still been moving forward. At Heathrow we are spending £200 million on the construction of Terminal 4. It is due to open, on schedule, in 1985. At Gatwick we've just completed a £24 million satellite terminal. And work has begun on a second main terminal costing a further £200 million. When the above projects are complete, all feasible developments will be at an end. There is talk of building a fifth terminal on the sewage works west of Heathrow.

But this scheme could never be ready in time to meet the expected number of passengers.

It would cost £100 million more than developing Stansted.

And, in any case, it would exceed the government limit on air traffic movements at Heathrow which comes into force in 1985.

At the British Airports Authority we think the question has been up in the air long enough. To ensure that foreign currency continues to land in London, we must come down in favour of Stansted.

EEC's crucial meeting in Athens

Howe crusade begins to take effect

Stony broke, so sheep farmers must go short

Sir Geoffrey Howe, the Foreign Secretary, ended two days of patient lecturing of his EEC colleagues in Athens colleagues in Athens yesterday, confident that they were beginning to repent of what Britain believes to be their profligate spending ways. He thought that his four-and-

-half year crusade in the Community to cut agricultural spending and to find a fairer way of assessing Britain's EEC budget contribution, could be edging towards an end. This second of the three-day special council had concentrated on money. First there was discussion of Britain's ideas for strict financial guidlines on farm spending, which was made more urgent by the news that the Commission was having to freeze payment of £240m this year for want of ready money. There was discussion, too, of the British idea for a "safety net", which would be set up to catch Britain if it was required to pay more than its fair share of the Community budget.

On both these things, Sir

Geoffrey said afterwards, there was "a more constructive approach" than there had been at the beginning of the meeting.
"We haven't reached the point where the whole Community is clambering up our safety net to salvation", he said. But he believed the fact that

The most obvious source of future political power centres around the President's wife, Mrs Imelda Marcos. She already holds several important positions, including Minister of Human Settlements, which disburses a vast amount of government funding. She is so Governor of Metro Manila, the capital area.

She recently announced that she would retire from politics and play no part in next year's election should the ruling New Society Movement (KBL) allow her to step down. There is not likely to be a lack of KBL sponsors for a motion that she should stay, but any subsequent grab for power by Mrs Marcos would not be so well received by the public at large.

She would most likely have the backing of General Fabian Ver the armed forces Chief of Staff and the men who control the broad, high ground of the Phillippines' natural resources popular figure in the Army and can only hope to maintain his present position so long as the Marcos family rules. Whether he could rally the armed forces behind Mrs Marcos is in doubt especially in the light of recent Military Academy.

Mrs Marcos's erratic and free-spending ways would not make her a President to delight Washington: The man most likely to find favour there would be Mr Cesar Virata, the present Prime Minister, an American-trained technocrat, who has done his best to see that policies recommended by International Monetary Fund are carried out. THE ARTS

Along with other stirring tales of old South Bank battles from the boardroom to the picket line, Peter Hall's Diaries have reopened the directorial can of worms that occasioned the resignations of Jonathan Miller and Michael

Briefly, the story begins at the turn of the Seventies with Hall's arrival at the National Theatre and his simultaneous conversion to the doctrine of militant classicism. To the consternation of his admirers, the director of The Wars of the Roses and the drop-out Hamlet announced that he was turning his back on these youthful follies and would be playing no more topical games with the nation's

Even while Hall was setting up his cultural strongroom Miller was raiding it and gleefully spiriting the contents away to Edwardian Venice and colonial Nigeria – taking his cue from the kind of intellectual buccaneering that had made things hum at Stratford in the previous decade. By 1970, Miller's star was rising towards Hall's zenith, and not the least of the ills that befell the new National Theatre was the fatal conjunction that brought them together for two unhappy years and a much-publicized divorce.

The effect of this personal split was to divide the classical theatre itself into rival factions with Hall and Miller cast as opposing figure-heads. Hall stood for centres of excellence; Miller for lightweight, fly-by-night operations. Hall stood for official classicism; Miller for iconoclastic novelty. Hall liked working with stars; Miller with Miller did parentage, and showed herself in crisp, faultlessly memorized com-mand of the lines. normally matter very much; it only normally matter very much; it only starts to matter when someone raises the spectre of a jackbooted autocrat dragooning actors and text into the service of a single interpretative viewpoint. Such an idea was abroad during the decade of the Hall Diaries. I wondered what truth there was in it, and in 1979, while this newspaper was suspended, I seized the chance of switching from the mistrusted role of reviewer to the increasingly indulged role of observer. The National Theatre was extremely hospitable, and gave me access to hospitable, and gave me access to the rehearsals of William Gaskill, Christopher Morahan, John Dexter and Peter Hall. Each director, it seemed to me, could have changed places with the other. Hall does not go off into Miller's cadenzas of baroque clowning (who does?), but, when it came to the practice of directing, their approach seemed identical. Unlike Dexter, who knows his texts and foomotes by heart, they do not go in for academic preparation. 'Above all, both derive their authority not from any pre-arranged master-plan but from the capacity to think very fast on their feet. Directors, as a rule, do not see each other at work. Whether or not this goes for Hall and Miller I cannot say; but I quit my spell as an observer feeling that much wasteful antagon is m might have been avoided if each could have been a fly on the others well.

Brandis Quartet Queen Elizabeth Hall

Encouragingly described in their publicity material as "an elitist ensemble", the Brandis Quartet of Berlin proved, in Beethoven's Op 18 No 1, to be a quartet of soloists in the best sense. Such equal-voiced play-ing seemed apt as in his revision of this piece before publication the composer was concerned with an even-handed distribution of musical interest between the instruments.

Quite different sorts of equivocation are sometimes at work in Schubert's C major Ouinter, for which the Brandis ensemble was joined by Steven Isserlis as second cellist. It is strange that London has not heard the Russian violinist Roman' Nodel before. Now 41, thought to have had the Romeo and domiciled in West Germany, he arrived at the Wignore Hall not as a tentative debutant but with a boldness when composing the slow Wignore Hall not as a tentative movement, and the work's debutant but with a boldness main weight lies here - perhaps springing from total command of his instrument. In a first half of Vivaldi, Tartini and Cesar but the Brandis players showed of Vivaldi, Tartini and Cesar an appreciation of the finale's Franck he now and again humour and the sophistications emerged too highly-strung of its sonata-rondo form, Even Franck's ardent Sonata seemed at times to burst out of its skin, with Gordon Back, otherwise admirable, forgetting how easily the piano can dominate the second moveattack and rhythmic tension. also a very wide range of dynamics and colour, Mr Nodel's characterization of Prokofiev's F minor Sonata was arrestingly vivid. Nor can he be over-praised for the potent contrasts of mood, multum in parro, that he found in 10 Preludes from Shostakovich's Op 34 in an uncommonly telling transcription for violin and piano by Dmitri Tzyganov. The Spanish pianist Mario Monreal was a virtuoso of unusual control, able to throw off seven Transcendental Studies by Liszt and the Carmen Fantasy chosen as first encore xoressiveness of each line, as effortlessly as if they had been grade-one exercises. He had formidable strength to match lightning dexterity, and always maintained the clearest texture. In climaxes he was inclined to harden his tone, certainly to an excessive degree for a work such as Chopin's B minor Sonata, while in this composer's more intimate lyri-cism his cantabile was insufficiently luminous. But both the Sonata and the Barcarolle found him appreciative of their logic and larger shape. If only there had been evidence of a more immediate and personal disquieting conclusion I have already mentioned: that some Western nations have a highly politicized concept of the moral issues involved, that they are apparently indifferent to the security interests of the US in Central and South America; and that they are too often content to acquiesce in human rights policies whose principal functions is to serve the political interests of the Soviet bloc. Sweden provides the extreme example of all these tendencies. Their human rights policies in the UN bodies are highly ideological and by no means "neutral" in their political content. Haven't we read too many clever things into their motivations? The majority of them - or so it seems to me – are just angry young men and women raging at the limitations of the human condition. May of them do not even consciously support socialism. They simply echo man's anguished cry since the beginning of time: "There has to be a better world, or life, or society than this

'Most disturbing for me have been the human rights issues'

The intellectuals we have in mind act in a spirit that assumes that human nature in the future may be qualitatively different from what it was in the past, a spirit that views each situation as tabula rasa which a plan can be imposed, and therefore sees experience in other times and places as having no real relevance. Intention becomes more important than experience, intelligence than custom. The notion persist that commu-nists are somehow morally superior to other elites which use amoral means to gain power and impose repressive minority dictatorships.
The sources are several.

One is the semantic confusion fostered by the communists themselves through their through their systematically perverse use of language. By calling "autonomous" that which is powerless, "federated" that which is unitary, "democratic" that which is autocratic, "united" that which is schismatic, "popular" that which is imposed by terror, peaceful" that which incites warin brief, by systematically corrupting language to obscure reality-the communists have made inroads into our sense of political reality. Language is, after all, the only medium in which we can think. It is exceedingly difficult to eliminate all the traditional connotations of words - to associate phrases like For a Lasting Peace and a People's Democracy" with neither peace nor popular movements nor democ-

A related form of semantic subversion, practised by commu-eradicated through social engineer-inst parties everywhere, is the effort to capture prestigious symbols, slogans, and traditions. Communist parties in the underdeveloped world attempt to indentify themselves with the slogans of national-ism and anti-colonialism. Communists in France attempt to identify themselves with the symbols of the Résistance, the French Revolution and the tradition of the left. French amunists have attempted to capture Victor Hugo, as American communists staked a claim to Tom Paine and Abraham Lincoln.

collectivization to peasants; of internationalism to the nations, of inexorable conflict to pacifists; of monolithic conformity to intellectuals; of state capitalism to the working classes; and of dictatorship to the middle classes short, if communist parties attempted to recruit support through the appeal of their own real values, the lines of conflict would clearly drawn. Communism whose values have a sharply limited appeal, would be readily defeated. The political temptation of "the

The destruction of Korean airliner 007 by Soviet rockets provides further evidence that violence and lies are regular instruments of Soviet policy and obliterates the conventional boundaries between peace and war. Soviet officials regularly behave as though truth were only what they said it was and as if violence were an instrument of first resort in foreign affairs. These Soviet actions and claims illuminate the Soviet conception of appropriate relations nations in peace time.

We, on the other hand, believe that truth is as vital to cooperation and peace among natious as among people. It is depressing to consider a world in which a major nation equipped with the most powerful modern weapons believes it has a sovereign right to fire on a commercial airliner lost over its

We are dealing here, not with the decisions of individuals, but with the decisions and priorities characteristic of the Soviet system. Not only did Soviet officials order the destruction of a civilian airliner and lie about it, they have also refused offers of international participation in search-and-rescue efforts in spite of internationally agreed-upon stan-dards and practices.

We are reminded once again that the Soviet Union is a state based on the twin principles of callousness mendacity, dedicated to the role of force, and governed by the idea of the dictatorship of the proletariate which in 1920 Lenin defined in these words: "The scientific concept of dictatorship means nothing more than unrestricted power, absolutely unimpeded by law or regulations and resting directly on force.

This East European joke, which came out of the Moreover computer over the weekend during one of its routine propaganda sessions, does not necessarily reflect the editorial policy of the Moreover management. With the advent of the first autumn poll in Britain (Kinnock closes gap on Thatcher!), our hearts sink collectively. It does not take an expensive statistical survey to prove that a new, young leader of the Labour Party will gain in popularity during his honeymoon period, any more than we need an opinion poll to prove that the weather is getting cooler.

There are several things about the Soviet Union which seem attractive from a distance, mostly the absence of things we find irksome here. They don't have opinion poils, or advertising, or ten demonstrations clogging up the traffic. It's a shame in a way that we only praise the Soviets for things they haven't got, never for anything they've got, but it's nice to be able to praise them for something And something they haven't got in profusion, I have realized over the past week, is storms.

The storm we have had in the past week is the Cecil Parkinson storm. You may have read about it. When Cecil Parkinson annouced that he intended to go on living with his wife, there was an mmediate storm. We knew there was a storm because the newspapers said so, a storm which grew, which raged about his head, which blew through Westminster and which thresteded to bring down, if not the Tory Party, at least Cecil

The oddest thing about this storm, as with so many newspaper storms, was that it seemed to have no visible effect outside newspapers. No walls were knocked down in Yorkshire, no trees fell across roads in the Midlands. I have travelled extensively on public transport the last week, and cavesdropped on conversations in all-our major pubs, and not once have I heard a reference to the Parkinson storm. People are simply not talking about it. I am reluctantly coming to the conclusion, bizzire though it sounds, that this storm has been a freak storm which happened only in Fleet Street and did not affect even nearby

One explanation for this may be that the public were puzzled by not finding the it is an exact replay, with the sexes reversed, of the earlier Coronation Street drama, in which Ken Barlow's wife decided to lesses him and then change her mind at the last moment. The nation-wide interest was chormous, but this was because we could watch it every night on IV, and share in Deirdre's struggle with herself. But when the public switched on to look for Mr Parkinson holding his wife's hand and saying "I'll make a go of it if you will" (music, credits), they looked in vain. They could believe in Ken Barlow, because they could see him with their own eyes, Mr Cecil Parkinson, I'm afraid, they tend to think of as a

The great question remains: why do the newspapers go on believing in the existence of and the great storm around. Mr Cecil Parkinson? And here I have a confession to make. I did not consult last Sunday's heavies for the answer. I am sure the answer was there. It always is there. The prouble is, it is always accompanied by an immensely complex and illegible diagram which invariably defeats me and makes me feel inferior. Sometimes it is labelled "Why Japanese air control missed Korean airliner", at other times it is labelled "How they defeated the Maze security system" or "Why oil slicks will go on happening", but it is always the same diagram. Last. Sunday it was presumably, labelled "How the Parkinson Storm grew", but readers will have to forgive me if I had not the heart to study it.

Caroline Moorehead looks at science fiction, the folklore of the twentieth century

The message from outer space

The timing of the recent speculation about a UFO's visit to a Suffolk pine forest could hardly have been better. This week the Book Marketing Council begins its promotion of 20 sciencefiction writers. The alien visitor serves to illustrate how, at least on one level, our attitudes towards space have scarcely changed in nearly a century. For the Tanham Wood spacecraft - a fast-moving object with powerful lights, disgorging a red ball full of in silver spacesuits - is little different from H. G. Wells's Martian. who arrived in the guise of a falling star on Woking Common in the mid 1890s.

Science fiction, so the experts say, is the most misunderstood genre in modern writing. No one can agree either when it began (Mary Shelley's Frankenstein? The publication of the first science-fiction magazines in America in the mid 1920s?) or quite how to define it. "Any fiction inspired by science and scientific change," says J. G. Ballard. "Any book," says Christopher Priest, rather more mockingly, "that has sci-fi on its cover."

In its list of 20 authors the Book Marketing Council includes H. G. Wells, Aldous Huxley and George Orwell alongside Ballard, Brian Aldiss and Michael Moorcock. The choice has been widely criticized, as Christopher Priest explains: "If you wish to, you can drag in any number of writers and call them science-fiction authors. Huxley and Orwell would turn in their

What, then defines science fiction? For publishers and writers alike the term appears to cover all writing that is speculative about the future, and some that is speculative about non-existent past. The traditional BEM (bug-eyed monster), clanking robots and the random rearrangement of time have not vanished as popular themes. Instead they have been joined by every permutation of modern science, including psychology, sociology, linguis-tics and medicine, although, as Brian Aldiss once put it, they almost always end with nemesis clobbering hubris. At one extreme lies the esoteric work of Ian Watson, the Oxford academic who writes about structuralism: at the hordes of popular and garish comics with their ingredients of horror, sadomasochism and the occult. In between, there is time travel, genetic mutation, Arthurian legend (very successful), "paranoid sci-fi", and enjoying a considerable current popularity the "fuzzies": typically "golden-furred and emerald-eyed, the largest of them two

There is also, of course, Tolkieninspired fantasy, often selling better than "pure" science fiction, though again definitions blur. "If it has a rocket on the cover, it's sci-fi," says Dick Judge, manager of Forbidden

Whatever the vocabulary the "genre" as all fans call it, appears to be booming once again. It is dominating the New York Times' best seller lists (in the shapes of Robert Heinlein's Friday, Arthur C. Clarke's 2001, James A Michener's Space and Isaac Asimov's Foundations Edge) and accounting for up to 20 per cent of some British paperback publisher's entire turnover. John Wyndham for example, has sold almost six million books in paperback alone. For aficionados it is a cult with its accepted classics -Clarke's 2001, Frank Herbert's Dune.

Leaving aside the question of science fiction's literary genesis, the genre achieved its commercial launch in the 1920s when the "pulps, with their threatened maidens in wispy

Bitter taste of reality

"China stinks." This was an American visitor's terminal judgment last year, in staid Harpers magazine, on the world's oldest civilization. Eight years before, film star Shirley Maclaine had reacted differently about the People's Republic: "Screne, I said to myself, that's the word. Screne," "I saw China" books before Mao's death in 1976 usually breathed cuphoria. Nowadays they spit bile.

What has precipitated this reverse?

Probably, and ironically, China's relatively greater openness since Mao's death. Earlier visitors, like Maclaine, David Rockefeller, and Felix Greene were shielded from the horrors of the Cultural Revolution by the lies of their guides. Now travellers are permitted somewhat more mobility and occasional informal contact. And the Chinese press has become more truthful.

Perhaps the greatest turnaround has been in the evaluation of the late Chairman Mao, a shift legitimized by the Communist Party's own 1981 Resolution on his "tragic errors" of the Cultural Revolution

Abortion threat Until recently information about China's peasantry - 80 per cent of the population - was scarce. Foreign academics were al-lowed brief "study trips" into the countryside, and journalists were lucky to get a day at a time on selected communes. Now Steven Mosher has written Broken Earth: The rural Chinese (available December Collier Macmillan), an account of his year (1979-80) in a southern village. Since leaving China three years ago. Mosher has been dismissed from Stanford's doctoral programme in anthropology for unspecified unprofessional conduct. tradition-bound peasantry and its self-serving officials. He saw his neighbours worshipping their ancestors and the gods, and burying the dead and getting married on auspicious days. As for their officials, the Chinese I spoke with insisted that most cadres look out for their own interests first, last, and always."

Hidden hierarchy

China's seemingly universal equality overwhelmed observers in the widecyed period. Harvard economist J. K. Galbraith wrote in China passage (1983). "Somewhere in the recesses of Chinese policy there may be a priveleged party and official hier-archy. Certainly it is the least ostentations fuling class in history. . . clearly, there is very little difference between rich and poor." But the New York Times Fox Butterfield identified 24 bureaucratic grades each with its perks, a system never discussed in China, he said, "to help preserve the illusion of egalitarian-ism. Another veteran of Harvard Chinese studies, Richard Bernstein, who represented Time magazine in twice for a few weeks, once in 1975, and again four years later, and social pysychologist Martha Livingston, are both "nurned on by China" (as they say), and write about its mental health in The Minds of The Chinase People (Prentice Hall, 1983).

Sheila Hillier, a sociologist at the London Hospital and at Barts, and J. A. Jewell, a London GP - both China specialists - would agree. They have investigated the Chinese health system on visits spanning the years of enthusiasm and disillusion, and they take a long view in their forthcoming Health care and traditional medicine in China: 1800-1982 (Routledge, September 1983). The People's Republic, they conclude, has provided and continues to provide comprehensive and thrifty had always been under the impression that you could log the fleeing of your youth by the increasingly fresh complexions of policemen. This may be true, but a far more accurate guideline is the galioping juniority of rock groups. I write with confidence, since the band booked to play at the summer street party has an average age of 12. They are called Kandi and the Cassettes, and not even my collea-gue Richard Williams has heard of them. Yet.

I sense disaster. Not even before chemistry O-level did I have such intimations of failure. The schism that has dogged every meeting of the organizing committee will be re-flected faithfully by a flasco on Saturday. Strange how catastrophe has a kind of scent. It infuses the air with tension, and seems to spook the children as though they were thoroughbred stallions before a prairie storm. If I weren't such a coward, I would boycott the occasion. After all, there is ample precedent in the Street Radical's snubbing of both the Jubilee and Royal Wedding festivities. On the second occasion his children actually sported tiny sandwich boards with the slogan, "Monarchy is a celebration of mediocrity". That may be true for all I know, but how terrible to foist such knowing phraseology on political innocents. Perhaps I should come up with an apt riposte. What about: "Street parties are a communal affirmation of autocracy"? No.

Reggae music is drifting across the street in broken measures. A woman's voice is riding high over the beat, wailing venomously: "De Queen she nothin' but a painted doll". But the voice does not belong to a Jamaican, nor, strictly speaking, to a woman. It comes from the larynx of Kandi, vocalist with the Cassettes and, so it is rumoured, winner of a scholarship to one of London's public schools for girls: She is scarcely pubescent, as sparrow-boned as Piaf in her decline, pale as a ghost, with black springs of Afro-permed hair. All round the sarage walls are younger children, my-own daughter included, mesmerized by the angular act of

It had to happen, daughterial demand for "a proper guitar, with wire coming out of it". I offer the usual return of service: "I can't afford it" and back comes the now customary stop-volley: "Then get some more money out of the wall." (A reference to the NatWest service it)

Bobsy Marshall "drops by", osten-sihly to "liaise" about Saturday but really to do a Mary Whitehouse over the corruptive properties of Kandi and the Cassettes.

She "drops by" again, demanding access to the following: (a) full lyrics of the Cassettes' intended programme at the party; (b) name, address and occupation of Kandi's father; (c) a copy of the local authority music licence for Saturday, As if I should possess any of the saturday. these. The trouble about such childless busy-bodies is that their caring instincts invariably manifest themselves in blanket censorship. My inner voice suggests she take an acid bath at her earliest convenience, but my outer one refers her to Parvis Maitland, A worse fate

The party is upon us; so too is the world and its wife (by which I mean the Maillands, the Petranellas, the Street Radicals) and its token pensioners, the cats Fidel and Raoul. Morgan Prewitt is of course in attendance, being bribed by his mother into near-tranquillity with a stream of confectionery, if he is quiet, that is only because he is seeking out the most strategic spot at which to throw a Morgasm. Even Caetano the window-smearer and Magnus the roof-burner have turned up — touting for trade I suppose. Kandi, quite repressing the classical scholar within her, is singing: "Gonna take me pistot to de palace". Someone is fiddling with the jackplugs in the pre-amp. It is Bobsy jackpings in the pre-amp. It is Boosy Marshall, trying to diconnect the band for the good of the community. My son at once staps in a parity bid for "a proper guitar with wires coming out of it". Suddenly it seems so much more effective than conventional arms.

'A woman's place is in the House'

People in their early forties are, nowadays, very fashionable, politi-cally speaking. So it was a chic move on the part of Mrs Thatcher (58 tomorrow) to appoint Emma Nicholson, at "forty-one and eleven twelths", a smidgin younger than party chairman, John Gummer, as vice-chairman in charge of women. Emma Nicholson is the daughter of Sir Godfrey Nicholson, a former Tory MP, and a grand-daughter of an earl. One of her sisters is married to a Foreign Office minister. Richard Luce, and another to Sir John Montgomery Cuninghame. Emma wears Jaeger-ish clothes and lives in a prettily cluttered Belgravia mews house. So far, so identifict Tory Lady. She departs from the stereotype in that she was one of the first women in the country to work in computer technology and in always, unswervingly, putting her career first.

"When I first started work, I found that none of the men I met was at all interested in my job. If I'd had a broader variety of friends then, perhaps, I would have met men who weren't so dismissive, but I didn't. I couldn't fit myself into the straitjacket that was all that seemed to be offered to me, I felt that I wanted to learn more."

"So I had to give up the idea of marriage although, obviously, I'm very sorry not to have had children.

Here is the task. Prepare a dish for eight based on two young guines fowl weighing just over a kilo each. Three garnishes - not in the sprig-ofparsley sense, but the classic French cuisine meaning of formal assemblies of accompanying vegetables and the like - are mandatory. Truffles and caviar are the only forbidden ingredients, but nothing may be prepared or cooked in advance of the four hours allotted for the job.

Ah yes. Your efforts must be set out on a silvered dish of vast expanse and placed before six judges, among them chefs of long experience and distinction. Then, when its presentation has been noted, the dish will be tasted and the balance of its flavours, textures and seasoning savoured or suffered.

Nine ambitious young chefs from hotels and restaurants up and down the country exercised their skills within these limits at the Dorchester in London last week. The occasion was a quarter-final of the Prix Taittinger, and it produced two semi-finalists, Herbert Berger of the Connaught Hotel, and Arthur Bukalo of the Inigo Jones restaurant in London, who will take on the competition from all over Europe in Paris later this month.

It was a marvellous day to be given fly-on-the-wall licence towatch the cooking the judging and all the backstairs bustle. The recipe, As compensation, I have always worked terribly hard at triendships." Graduating from the Royal Academy of Music with not quite enough talent to become a pro-fessional musician, she decided that the new field of computer technology sounded challenging. Vocational guidance experts told her that computer companies were unlikely to hire a music graduate who'd given up mathematics for ever at the age of eight. "I was so angry, I looked up 'computers' in the telephone directory and persuaded ICL to give me a test." She passed and began a tough training that became easier once she discovered similarities between music and computing and worked through problems "by applying fugal analy-

As an MP's daughter, she opted into politics early. "I have always seen it as the thing that mattered in achieving change for other people and the way to get a wrong put right." In 1979, she contested the Labour stronghold of Blyth in Northumberland, the first woman to do so. She lost the fight but won the highest ever Conservative vote.

Emma Nicholson: down the pits for votes

She sees her present political role as "a kind of constituency task, the 'constituency' being women's votes. I want to make the Conservative Party the natural one for women to

I said that this Government has been blamed for making women's you want a soft life, you wouldn't choose to go into politics. It was tough getting the miners' vote in Blyth. But I went down the mines and came up with some of their votes. This is not a marshmallow

What's needed, she feels, are more women candidates but the problem is the average woman's impossibly stretched timetable. "They're either so busy working their way up the career path or bringing up children or both that they don't have enough mental space to be as involved in politics as I should like them to be. "Anyone who sits around whining because a woman isn't in a particular position doesn't understand the meaning of the Sex Discrimination Act. Until we get parity in the number of people who apply for jobs, we can't complain about unequal selection. The way to get more women in Parliament is to give selection committees the widest possible choice of candidates." Well, yes, of course. But selection committees have been offered Emma Nicholson, a woman of intelligence, enthusiasm and an aptitude for hard work, Had she been a man, did she think that by now, she might have been selected for a winnable seat? "Oh yes", she said. "There are no two ways about seasoned breast meat. Cook it gently and lightly without allowing it to brown. Remove it as soon as you judge it is cooked but still a little pink in the middle. Set it aside to cool.

Dry the livers well. Add a little more butter to the pan and saute them briefly, without browning, until they are firm enough to slice. Remove then from the pan and pour off the fat. Add the brandy and port to the pan, stir briefly to dissolve the meat juices and quickly pour off and keep the liquid. Wipe the pan clean and heat the and set them aside to cool.

Carve the cooked guinea fowl across the grain into next slices. Slice the livers too into pieces of about the same thickness. Place slices of liver between slices of meat to make up groups of slices in the shape of the original breast meat. Roll out the puff pastry very thinly. Cut four pieces of pastry the same tear-shape and size the meat filling. Cut another four pieces the same shape but about 2.5cm (lin) .bigger all round.

Divide the mushroom mixture between the four larger pieces of pastry, placing it in a heap in the centre. Now arrange the sliced meat and liver on top. Moisten it with a little of the fortified pan juices. Turn in the edges of the pastry loosely over the filling. Dampen the exposed edges and top with a smaller piece of pastry. Form each of the packets in the same way, then invert them on to a dampened baking sheet so that the joins are out of sight underneath. Decorate with pastry trimmings and chill them for at least half an hour before baking. Just before baking them paint the tops with a glaze of egg yolk mixed with a tablespoon of water and bake in a preheated hot oven (220°C/425°F, gas mark 7) for about 20 minutes, or until puffed and Serve immediately with a sauce made by reducing the strained stock to about 150ml (4 pint), adding the port and cream, and reducing and seasoning the mixture to taste.

ASCII: Pronounced 'Askey', it stands for American Standard Code for Information Interchange. This international code lays down the binary numbers (0s and 1s) which represent each letter, symbol or number that you can type into a computer. Without ASCII, computers wouldn't be able to talk to each other.

Back-up: The procedure for making copies of vital data in case of fire, flood or coffee damage. Systematic copying and secure storage of information is vital - business depends on it.

BASIC: A computer language conceived to make life easier for novice computer programmers. It stands for Beginners All-purpose Symbolic Instruction Code.

BASIC has gone on to become the most widely used programming language for microcomputers.

Binary: Computers use a rather similar code to Morse, which has dots and dashes. Some people might actually call it 'a binary asynchronous communications protocol'. But to put it simply binary means two-just two bits of code are used, just like dots and dashes.

Bit: Having grasped the complex mathematics of 'binary' you'll wonder what to call a 'dot' or a 'dash.' It's simple enough-bit.

Buffer: The place in a computer's memory where you put data before processing it.

> Bug: A program error. Coined by early computniks who found that insects played havoc with the workings of their huge machines.

Byte: Short for 'by eight', normally a group of eight bits which contains enough information to represent an ASCII number, letter or symbol.

Character: Any symbol that can be displayed on a computer.

COBOL: The grandad of computer languages and widely used until the arrival of microcomputers en masse a few years ago. COBOL, or Common Business Oriented Language, is used by most mainframe and minicomputers. It's been criticised for being too cumbersome (no computer language pleases everyone) but some micros now run it.

Command Driven: A software package controlled by special command words keyed in by the user. Not for novices, who work better with menu driven programs.

CPU: The Central Processing Unit is the heart of any computer. It controls the other units and applies arithmetic and logic to the data fed in.

Cursor: When typing onto a computer screen you need a way of seeing where you are. The cursor tells you where the next thing you type will appear or indicates characters you wish to delete or move.

Daisy Wheel Printer: Produces high-quality typing. The printing head resembles a daisy, with preformed characters at the end of spokes. The Merlin printer produces up to 700 words a minute in a variety of typefaces.

Data Management: For business micros. Allows users to maintain files of information either as a simple electronic card index, or as a more exotic enquiry system, able to extract facts and figures and print them out as reports.

daisy wheel

Disk: Computer memory is expensive, disks are cheap. A computer can make magnetic marks on a £5 disk and can store 100,000 words. To keep the same amount inside the computer, you'd need a memory costing the best part of £1,000. Disks are also small and light: a 5 inch disk can be sent by post. TALK

Dot Matrix Printer: One of the ways of matrix printer has a battery of pins which create characters from a pattern of date characters from a pattern of dots.

Eight-Bit or Sixteen-Bit: The computer industry's answer to 'horsepower'. You don't need to know how many bits a computer has. What matters is 'can it do the accounts?' and 'how many people can use it at the same time?

Electronic Mail: Services such as Telecom Gold which allow computer terminals to dial up over the telephone network to consult personal electronic mailboxes.

Footprint: The space taken up on a desktop by a microcomputer or terminal. Some machines currently on the market have rather big feet.

GIGO: Garbage In, Garbage Out. All too often computer errors are not the machine's fault but the operator's.

Hardware: The mechanical electronic and plastic bits and pieces of a computer.

Input/Output (I/O): Input is the information fed into a computer. Output is the information produced by the computer.

Interactive: Computers operate on information in different ways. They may be programmed to store up data and programs and to work on them at a given time: this is batch processing. Or they may be required to respond at onceinteractive computing. All microcomputers are interactive.

> IPSS: International Packet Switched Service, British Telecom's international computer data transmission service.

K: Literally, a thousand. In the computer world there are actually 1024 bytes in a K or Kilobyte (not many people know this-not many people need to).

Language: The native language of a computer is the morse code of the binary system, but writing programs in binary is far too cumbersome and longwinded. So, computers have high level languages \ like BASIC and COBOL which are more like English and describe the work we want to do.

Programs are written in these languages and then translated into binary or machine codes.

language

Memory: A measure of the power of a computer is its memory capacity. A typical £100 home computer holds about 1,000 characters in its memory - barely enough for a letter.

Something like Merlin's office microsystem (with space for nearly 250,000 characters) can hold a couple of sequels to The Winds of War, and let the accountant run his payroll program at the same time.

It can read any memory circuit it likes, at random. That's why it's called Random Access' Memory. However, it isn't random. It's fast, direct access. (See ROM).

ROM: Coded information stored in computer memory just evaporates when the computer is switched off. But computers need to be told what to do next time they're turned on. This information is stored in wires. Very fine wires. 100,000 on each chip. The computer can read the codes, but it can't change them. They're called Read-Only Memory - ROM.

Jobless: Prior's grim forecast

Prior. I think one of the extraord nary things about my position is that I have been regarded by the Conservative Party ever since 1974 as a person who was seeking a compromise and a way of uniting people, whether it be trade unionists or whoever, and I presume that that was one of the reasons why in the end I was sent to Northern Ireland. There may have been other reasons as well, but that was one of them. And yet I suppose I have been the subject of almost more controversy in the views that I held than any other leading politician in the party. I sometimes think my opponents can't have it both ways. They can't say to me, "You're a compromiser on the one hand and then on the other hand, "You are always leading revolts against the leadership". The fact of the matter is that those who have tended to take my point of view - the so-called wets, if one has to give them a name - haven't perhaps given as much credit to the supply-siders as the dries have deserved for what they have accomplished.

And I don't think the dries have given much credit to the wets both for what they have sought to achieve in retaining those values of com-passion and understanding which have always been a part of the Conservative Party. And also our desire to accept a large degree of radical reform. I don't think we do ourselves any good by continuing the argument in the barren way that it has been conducted in the past few

But are the main arguments about the fundamental nature and logic of the Government's economic policy

Prior: I think there is far less argument about that now than there was. I don't see 'nowadays the constant reiteration of money supply being the only thing that matters that one saw five, six, seven years ago. I don't see the constant reiteration that supply side economics can put everything right that I did a few years ago. On the other hand, I have to say that on my side of the party there is a much greater realization that there are limitations on the amount of money that one can actually pump in. Are you optimistic or pessimistic about the economy now

Prior: I am certainly more optimistic than I was. I think the recovery has been patchy and I am still deeply worried about the level of unemployment, but certainly I think that there is a much greater realization in management and on the shop floor about what we have to do. I see no reason why we shouldn't achieve reasonable levels of growth, and I am glad that interest rates have come down, and I am glad that the pound has failen in Government economic policy has again been attacked by a number of senior Conservatives, among them John Biffen, Leader of the House, and Francis Pym, former Foreign Secretary. In the last Parliament, one of the Government's most persistent critics from within its own ranks was James Prior, Employment Secretary until becoming

Secretary for Northern Ireland. Yet he has remained on the Cabinet's key "E" Committee, which formulates economic policy. In an interview with George Brock and Nicholas Wanshott, he began by explaining his sometimes awkward position in the Conservative Party

Looking back over the years, I think one of my difficulties with the was the high interest rate, high exchange rate policy. I think that the policy which we have pursued for the past few years has been very reasonable. I think that the relax-ations have helped stimulate in a sensible way while at the same time keeping a tight control over public porrowing.

I have always been an optimist. But I don't think that the world is going to get back into the massive growth rates of the Fifties and Sixties and we do have to face up to the fact that as an old country we have become uncompetitive many aspects. We are facing the full flood of competition from the labour market-oriented economies of the Far East and we face the problems of technology. I don't lieve that simply pumping money into the economy at the rate the Labour Party suggests as a means of reducing unemployment would work. I don't think that even Keynes would be favouring a massive increase in public expenditure.

Therefore I think we have to recognize that unemployment as measured in a conventional sense is going to remain high in Western society and therefore you have to be thinking the whole time of new ways of seeking to tackle the problems of unemployment and new ways of presenting the fact.

How long do you expect the resent high levels of unemployment

Prior: I have to say that for the whole of this decade we are going to be faced with a very difficult unemployment problem and I don't believe we are going to be able to solve the problem by simply, on the one hand pumping in vast sums of money, or on the other relying on the economy through changes on the: supply side to bring about a

We shall have to do very well over the next few years to decrease unemployment by the methods which have proved successful in the past and I-think that we have got to think of new ways of doing so. I don't think that we should be ashamed of saying what the debate is about, but one shouldn't put it in such a way that one is being callous.

Do you think that the Governmen has appeared too hard-hearted? Prior: I think that it would be unfair to suggest that the Government is hard-hearted. There are elements in the Conservative Party who regard some of us as softies and that they are the only ones who are prepared to accept the hard arguments. I am quite prepared to put across very hard arguments and talk very toughly on things like wage increases and the need for greater efficiency and so on.

Yet at the same time I recognize that there are vast numbers of. people in Britain who are intensely patriotic and proud of what they are doing but don't actually aspire to greatness in society; they just want to go about their ordinary daily task and live with their families in reasonable conditions. They have ust as much dignity and deserve just as much respect as those who are able to be the front-runners in

Sometimes I think that we tend, for reasons of economics or because of our backgrounds, to think that everyone has got to be tremendously efficient and tremendously able and enterprising and so on. That isn't what society is made up of I can play a part in putting forward our policies in a sensible, reasonable, understanding way. Sometimes we don't always do so.

If the Government does not deliberately soften its image, will it not be vulnerable to David Owen and the SDP?

Prior: I think that Dr Owen's tactics may be the correct ones for him, which makes it even more important that people like myself should be seen to be playing a major part in the Conservative Party, not shirking the difficult decisions but seeking to explain them and showing the compassionate side. Compassion is a word that I am in no way ashamed of using

I have represented a predomimantly working class constituency all my time in Parliament and I could my time in Parliament and I could never have been elected unless vast numbers of very decent, ordinary working class people had not voted me in. Now, they don't resent the fact that I had a public school-education. They don't resent the fact that I had a public school-education. that I am a member of Bupa or what have you. They know all these things. They know I live in a bigger house than most of them and that I have a farm. They still vote for me. I sometimes wonder why, but they still vote for me.

Are you not open to charges of disloyalty to the Prime Minister to open up a wider debate about nemployment and the economy?

Prior. I don't think I have said anything on this subject in this interview which has been in any way disloyal to the Prime Minister. Therefore, if I can say what I have just said without it in any way being disloyal to the Prime Minister, I don't see why there shouldn't be a very considerable debate on it. think it could achieve a great deal

We have to understand on my side of the party the necessity for pretty tough measures and I think the other side of the party has to understand that if those measures are going to succeed and you are going to build a decent society then on not only have to explain what you are doing but you have to help in every way that you can. It's something we ought to be able to do in a second period of government.
It has been said that you are bored with your job as Ulster Secretary and would like another job. Is that so? Prior: No, it's totally untrue. If I were bored by the job I certainly wouldn't have told Mrs Thatcher that I was keen to go back after the election. I was extremely keen to go back, because I felt that I had started something in the Assembly, albeit something that was going to take time, and I wished to go back in a position where the Secretary of State didn't have to begin all over again.

My guess is that, notwithstanding the interest advance speculation, it will all turn out to be pretty much the victory. celebration that it ought to be. But even if I am wrong and the journalists enjoy some of the infighting that they largely missed at Brighton, I shall shed no tears for my absence. Instead I have been giving thought to next week's confrontation: in Cabinet on next year's spending plans. We are told that Peter Rees, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is still about £1 1/4 billion short of his target for economies. If it is not too late, I would like to remind him of one candidate which seems so far to the British Library,

For those who have not followed the story so far, Shirley Williams approved in 1978, and Norman St John-Stevas endorsed in 1980, a plan to build a brand new British Library on a 9½-acre site next door to Euston Station. Since then the Prince of Wales has laid a foundation stone, and the buildozers have got to work. But there are rumblings of discontent within the arts establishment. Professor Hugh Thomas - Lord Thomas, head of the Centre for Policy Studies and one of the Prime Minister's trusted advisers - has mustered a formid-able lobby of supporters, ranging from Sir Karl Popper to Lord Kaldor, from Sir John Betjeman to Iris Murdoch in defence of the existing British Museum Reading Room in Bloomsbury, and produced

By contrast: the official scheme, when complete,

For the first time in a decade I have should be amended to more than managed to forgo the pleasures of £300m by now, and reckons that if the party conference. Not for me Sir we proceed, the final bill will not show much change from £600m of Tory England, the exchange with I am sure he is right about that pamphlet published soon after the neral election, I wonder whether the Treasury might not wisely take advantage of the present disarray in the groves of academe and scrap the whole thing altogether. The justification for this huge piece of public works - apart from the natural inclination of all institutions to get themselves a monument is that all the books the Reading Room cannot accommodate (and it is supposed to receive a copy of every book published) have to be shipped off to dim and distant Woolwich, whence it takes all of 24 hours to collect them for would-be readers: that the Reading Room can no longer accommodate all those who require to use it; and that in this day and age it is nothing short of a scandal that we do not have a custom-built, properly air-conditioned sanctuary for the ational archive.

Now, according to Lord Thomas and his allies, if it was true that the Reading Room was short of seats back in the 1960s, that is not the case today. Still, I suppose 24 hours is an unconscionable time to wait for the volume of one's choice; and has muddled on for 200 years without the benefit of proper airconditioning now that such scientific aids to preservation are on offer our descendants might say thank-you to us for making use of £600m?

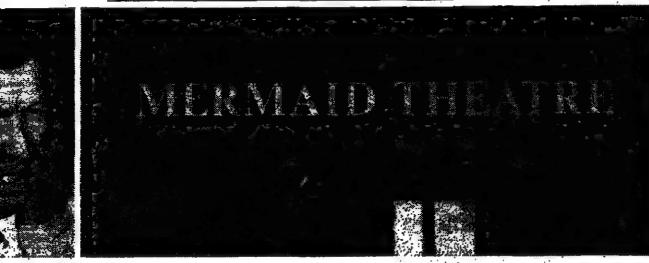

Nor is it just the capital cost which should terrify the Treasury. There is also the little matter of the running costs. Fifteen years ago the component bodies which are due to form the British Library limped along it seems, with a payroll of 550. Last year this had grown to 1,300. Ray Buckton, shunted in to stage-manage the purchase of a theatre on the rocks

You will hardly believe this - I abruptly, much worse, following the found it difficult to credit myself - ruling that the sums advanced for but, not content with the newspaper and the bank that they intend to found and run (both of which wonderfully lunatic projects I have recently discussed here), the trade unions are now proposing to buy and manage a theatre. The theatre is the Mermaid, which is unfortunately now for sale after falling into financial difficulties. Mr Abdul Shamji and his firm, Gomba, had made a bid for it, but the union consortium (Municipal Boilermakers, TGWU, Nalgo and Nupe) has now entered the auction, and may yet snatch the prize from beneath Mr Shanji's nose, particularly if they can get their bank founded in time to advance the cash for the purchase; the question of arranging for favourable reviews of the plays in ably wait for a bit, but the money might be a little shy if they approached ordinary sources of finance, if only because those in the business of advancing risk capital have probably noticed that most of our union leaders cannot run a union, never mind a newspaper or a hank and Mr Ray Buckton, who is apparently in charge of the project, has not hitherto been known as an expert either on drama itself or the successful business management of playhouses and productions, or on anything else much, for that matter. So Messrs Codron and White, Hall and Nunn are probably not contemplating suicide at the thought of the new competition putting them out of business and anyone who has read Hall's recently published Diaries will recall the effects of union action in his case, which was to bring the National Theatre to the very edge of closure and ruin and persuade Hall to vote Conservative for the first time in his life. There is something wonderfully touching in the dottiness of this recent passion among the unions for venturing into areas of enterprise which require huge sums of money (and enormous reserves of specialized skills, none of which they severe financial straits already indeed, one or two are not far from insolvency - and this state of affairs PHS is almost certainly about to become, the building of the new Labour Party headquarters should not have come from the unions' general funds. Part of the unions' money troubles can be attributed to the fact that unemployed members do not pay much in the way of subscriptions, and a general falling-off in the rate of recruitment has added to the decline in income, but most of the difficulty comes from good, old-fashioned incompetence, reflected in the appallingly high proportion of union funds that goes on administration or bureaucracy, as the unions call it when they are attacking the government. Indeed, we have just seen a striking demonstration of the critical financial situation among the unions in the news that some of them - by no means all obscure or small ones have been obliged, for the first time, to reduce the number of votes they buy at the Labour Party conference (they get exactly as many as they pay for - it is called an "affiliation fee", and the numbers affiliated have traditionally borne little resem-blance to the numbers of those eligible to be affiliated). And this is the movement that wants to run a newspaper, a bank and a theatre! For all I know, plans are already well advanced for the TUC to go into all sorts of other businesses - a chain of men's outfitters, say (foot-wide lapels guaranteed), or of grocery shops (no Chilean coffee sold), or a travel agency ("See the nightclubs of Moscow and the steel mills of East Germany - One-way tickets at fantastic discounts").

But a theatre? A theatre? Let us try to envisage the scene, literally as well as figuratively.

First of all, the name will have to go; Mermaid is far too frivolous, and its ownership, its aims and the kind of thing to be found on its boards. How about The Proletariat? (I can see the advertising campaign already: "What's on at The Proletariat tonight, darling?") Or, if a more human touch is thought desirable, what about The Len Murray? Some of the possibilities are fully inter-changeable with names that I helpfully proposed for the TUC's newspaper - The Reference Back, for instance, or The Composite Resolution; other ideas can be sought in the history of thisgreatmovementofours, such as The Peterloo Massacre, The Tolpuddle Martyrs or The Forty-Hour Week (some of these sound more like pubs han theatres, I admit, but that might not be a bad thing as far as enticing the customers is con-

Then there is the question of repertoire. Here I have to offer the new management a word of warning; if they imagine that all those earnest left-wing playwrights -Griffiths, Edgar, Hare, Brenton, Barker - are going to rush forward with their plays, proud to have them put on at The Death to Blacklegs, they are right, but if they think that the carnest left-wing playwrights in question, seized by comradely feelings, are going to waive their royalties, I fear that disappointment may soon be felt backstage at: The Flying Picket

Even plays which are out of copyright, and on which therefore no royalties are payable, will pose problems. Shakespeare will banned for a start; his attitude to the working-class, particularly in Julius Caesar, Henry VI, Part II and Coriolanus, is lamentably reactionary, and if the TUC Folderols should mount a production of Hamlet they will have to cut Act V, there would certainly be complaints that it is sexist as well. The name of the union playhouse should reflect Union, understandably affronted by

6 If they think that all those earnest left-wing playwrights, seized by comradely feelings, are going to waive their royalties, I fear that disappointment may soon be felt backstage at The Flying Picket 9

Nor does all that exhaust the have). Many of the unions, including some of the largest, are in very difficulties that face Binkie Buckton.

Equity (which is, of course, affiliated to the TUC) has very strict rules about pay for actors in West End theatres, and its members are not permitted to accept less than the down. What happens when The Block Vote runs into financial difficulties (about half an hour after opening, I imagine) such that not all the overdrafts of the TUC Bank, nor all the free advertising in the TUC Newspaper, will turn the tide? Requests for the cast to take a pay cut (besides coming ill from the TUC) will have to be refused and even if the cast and their union could be persuaded, let them just try' it on NATTKE (see the Hall diaries,

It is useless to tell the union leaders that the cobbler (with, of course, permission from the National Association of Boot and Shoe Operatives) should stick to his last; the apparently implacable desire of the union movement to make a public idiot of itself thrice over - newspaper, bank, theatre - is clearly too strong, and moreover it has been making a public idiot of itself in the conduct of its own business for so long that its leaders presomably think that no further diminution of public esteem can take place. (Of course, they will probably lose their members' money in these enterprises, but I am sure their members will count it well lost for the fun they have had watching from the sidelines.)

Beaumont (the playwright, not the late theatrical impresario) had a word for it What things we have seen

The Big Sister state rolls a little closer

The findings of the draft report into sive. Just as plastic bullets were first extreme right-wing penetration of tried out in Northern Ireland, then the Conservative Party, produced by many police forces in with the blessing of the former party chairman, raise uncomfortable ques-tions about the direction in which the Tory party is turning.

! It appears that not only have some people from the nec-Nazi fringe infiltrated the party but that some have actually stood as official Conservative candidates in general and local elections.

But, though this report will be gleefully pounced on by some socialist propagandists, neo-Nazis socialist in propagations in the constraint place within the Conservative Party. Far more frightening in many ways the civilized and undeniably democratic members of the New Right, operating from such base camps as the Conservative Philosophy Group, the Social Affairs Unit and the Centre for Policy Studies, because they do occupy places of influence in the heartland of the Conservative Party.

A main thrust of their arguments, forcefully expressed within the elite echelons of their party, is that the role of the state needs to be strengthened rather than weakened in many areas of everyday life. As Maurice Cowling an influential Conservative ideologue, argues in a seminal essay, "Authority should be the byword of freedoom."

The impact of these ideologues and of the debilitating effects of the Irish question on British politics can be seen in a number of recent developments as well as proposals for the next session of Parliament. Taken together, they represent a rignificant lurch towards an authoriurian state.

In a move unprecedented in educational history, Sir Keith Joseph, the Secretary of State for Education, sought last month to lay down the parameters of correct thinking in schools. He told a joint council of the O-level and CSE boards, preparing the syllabus of the proposed common 16-phis examination, that reference should be omitted from the physics curriculum to "the social and economic issues which arise from scientific know-

In the case of the history syllabus, Sir Keith demanded "Acknowledge-ment that one of the aims of studying history is to understand the development of the shared values which are a distinctive feature of British society."

If a socialist Education Secretary had the temerity to tell schools that "one of the aims of studying history is to understand the oppositional values which are a distinctive feature of the class stroggle in British society", it would be no less objectionable. Politicians, left or right, should be discouraged from defining for reachers the ideological sims of the classroom.

Sir Keith's clumsy attempt at ideological engineering comes at a time when ideological scanning by the state has become more obtru- The outhor is editor of New Socialist.

The recent experience of Mrs Madeleine Haigh, who, after writing a letter to her local paper opposing the siting of cruise missiles, received a visit from Special Branch officers claiming to investigate a mail-order frand (a claim which later proved to be bogus) has received extensive press coverage as an exceptional case. But the National Council for Civil Liberties has shown me papers which suggest that the Special Branch has developed dossiers on many law-abiding citizens, from opponents of blood sports, people frequenting homosexual pubs, those involved in the admirable "melting pot" foundations in Brixton, to activists in the peace campaign. The Government also intends, in the next Parliament, to entrench the power of the centralized state in a way that is provoking opposition even from its most loyal supporters. Since 1501, local authorities have enjoyed the freedom to levy rates at whatever level they desired. This power now constitutes the one key area of decision-making left to local councils, already reduced by a series of centralizing measures to a minor, subaltern role. If this power is removed by central government diktat, as is being proposed, there will be little incentive for people to take part in local elections and still less scope for conneillors to serve their constituents.

There was a time when conservatism was associated with getting central government off the backs of the people. This remains part of the rhetoric of platform speakers at the Conservative conference in Black-pool. But the rhetoric is now ceasing to connect with reality, as we move towards a Big Sister state.

THE CRIME OF VIOLENCE

The motion for debate on the Conservative Party agenda is seldom the precise motion on which the minds hearts and speeches of most of the Tory representatives are concentrated. It is usually one which maximizes agreement and minimizes dissent - which was the case with the motion yesterday on law and order, which did no more than ask the government to take "further measures to strengthen the force of law." But a sensible Cabinet Minister on such occasions directs his speech to what is in the minds of his party and that is what Mr Leon Brittan did yesterday when he addressed the conference for the first time as Home Secretary.

What the conference wanted was stiffer sentencing for serious, and particularly violent crimes. The intense concern of the Tories in the constituencies was shown by the very large number. of motions submitted on law and order - 99 compared with 27 on defence, 20 on the economy and 55 on employment and industrial relations. Overwhelmingly. these demanded heavier penalties and greater realism in sentencing, which was also the sense of most of the speeches from the floor yesterday, though some sensibly reminded the conference that detection and punishment are not all sufficient remedies for a violent society.

The challenge to the government was that despite the money given to the police, and more intelligent policing methods, crime is rising. Every day the public is made aware of some new unspeakably vile offence against the person, and often the most vulnerable, the old, the very young, or women. That was the rationale behind the depenalty which the House of and also to enable the Attorney climate of the time. It is also the rationale behind the demand for heavier sentences now.

It is made not simply by Conservatives, but by a majority of voters who support all parties. On the "soft" side of the penal argument, what is usually stressed is the need for better detection of the criminal. That goes without saying, but it should equally go without saying that the vicious criminal has little to fear from detection if a soft sentence follows. What is no less serious, is the demoralizing effect of soft sentencing on both the police and the public. The police ask what is the point of taking risks to secure a criminal who pays a comparatively small price for his callousness. The public may lose confidence in the criminal justice system, and become less willing to give the police the co-operation on which successful detection often de-

Having announced, at the time of the capital punishment debate, that twenty year mini-mum sentences will apply to those who murder police officers, Mr Brittan now intends to apply the same rule to those who murder prison officers, to terrorists and to those who commit sexual or sadistic murders of children. Those who kill when committing robberies with fire-arms will also serve a twenty year sentence and there will be "very long sentences" for killers of nightwatchmen, postoffice staff and others who do jobs that make them vulnerable. Very sensibly, Mr Brittan also intends to legislate to increase the maximum sentence for carrying Commons rightly rejected as General to refer over-lement incompatible with the moral sentences to the Court of Appeal which would virtually indicate the proper penalty in future similar cases, though without altering the sentence of the case referred.

> None of these changes infringes the tradition that the bands of the judiciary should not be tied, and that judges should be free to determine sentences in the light of individual circumstances. Without recourse to mandatory sentencing, he is signalling to the judiciary that, since life imprisonment means life unless he commutes it, he will not commute it to less than twenty years for the stated offences. That is a wise course and so is his proposal to meet public criticism of the gap between other sentences and the imprisonment served for them by new arrangements with the

To combine these changes with an attempt to clear the prisons of lesser offenders must be right and the Home Secretary will be widely supported. Yet in the end, the violence of a society is not merely determined by detection and penalties. It is a cultural phenomenon. The easy violence on television, film and video is part of this cultural phenomenon, and many people, producers, writers and businessmen, not to say the consuming public have responsibilities for it. It defies common sense to think that treating cruelty and violence as legitimate entertainment has no effect on behaviour. If the public itself will make it clear that it will not support a culture of violence, that would be at least as beneficial to a the rationale behind the demaximum sentence for carrying decent society as the measures mands for a return of the death firearms to life imprisonment, Mr Brittan announced yesterday.

With a little extra radical restructuring in defence courage and some not very radical analysis Mr Heseltine could achieve both defence cuts and an improvement in Britain's long-term defences.

On mobilization the British Army is brought up to strength by reservists so that its order of battle consists of at least onethird part-time soldiers. The other two services have a smaller reserve component, but also a smaller capability for expansion. Since the abolition of conscription British military manpower has been reduced steadily - 13 per cent in the last ten years with very little provision for expansion, unlike all the other a much wider reserve of men European allies.

Britain thus suffers two penalties for the maintenance of strictly volunteer forces. It pays a much higher price for a much smaller military capability, in allthree services, than any of the allies. Secondly it is condemned to a narrow military base which is unable to achieve the necessary expansion and is constantly being narrowed even further.

The rising cost of equipment and manpower over the last 20 years has shown that it is not possible to maintain allvolunteer forces at the original strength envisaged when con- compared to its potential fireto achieve a better future.

This will involve breaking down the rigidities of manpower policy, career structure, precurement procedures and policy, operational deployment which have paralysed the system hitherto. On manpower the present fixed ratios between regular and reservist forces should be revised. For too long the regular forces have been cut without any matching provision for expanding our military base in such an emergency. They could in fact be cut much more with the right machinery for expansion, which would draw on and women taking part in properly constructed reservist with appropriate schemes

Once the armed forces can be weaned away from a natural obsession with structure, and protecting their narrowing base, manning levels in the forces could be fundamentally and profitably reassessed with a view to raising productivity in peace time. The ratio of officers to men needs to be reviewed. It compares unfavourably with many modern armed forces. So does the strength of each force, more recruitment of women. which should match the abolition of a ponderous career structure which guarantees servicemen a lifetime in the armed forces followed by pensions and associated services which cost £3,000 annually for each member of the armed forces. To that must be added their housing, the education of carried on the defence budget:

On aquipment policy there should be similar revision. The needs of an elite force, with high standards of professionalism, have led to a pervasive determination to purchase only the best equipment, designed and built in Britain. It is ironic that so much of this equipment was then shown up last year in a contest with a second-ranking power which had been able to buy its equipment on the open market. The cost advantages of more standardization within Nato, longer production runs, and more improvization would be

Finally, deployment. The Soviet threat is met in Central Europe by forces of which the British contribution is a tiny part. Britain is much the best endowed European power to contribute to the emerging threat somewhere on the flanks since otherwise the Americans would be left to do it alone. In the 1980s the preponderance of British forces permanently maintained on the European continent should be lightened, with Britain's Rhine Army reduced and the Air Force redeployed. It is a complicated and radical exercise which is required. That is the challenge facing Mr Heseltine today.

MURDER IN RANGOON

The bomb explosion in Rangoon odious than those of Stalin and on Sunday which killed four South Korean Cabinet ministers and fifteen other people is the second tragedy to have struck South Korea in less than two months. In terms of its international significance, it does not compare with the destruction of the South Korean airliner off Sakhalin Island on September 1. Even its effect on South Korean domestic politics is unlikely to be excessively damaging. President Chun Doo Hwan has lost two of his most senior economic advisers, as well as a foreign minister of unusual ability and experience, as the result of the combing. Burms is one of the few Asian countries with which North Korea has good relations and the North Koreans would be unlikely to jeopardize their friendship with the Burmese in such a way.

There are moreover a number of minority and other dissident groups within Burma itself which might equally well have been responsible. Nonetheless President Chun is likely to stick to his conviction that the North Koreans were behind the bombing, and in one sense it is his

In the mid-nineteen seventies Dr Henry Kissinger mooted the idea of cross-recognition, whereby South Korea's western allies would recognize North Korea in exchange for recognition of South Korea by Moscow and Peking, and a similar idea was put forward last year by President Mitterrand of France. But such suggestions have always foundered, largely because neither Moscow nor Peking is prepared to exert too much pressure on the North Koreans for fear of losing influence to the other. Sir, In the Parkinson affair, it is a pity that you concentrated your editorial upon current sexual attitudes more than on the simple personally involved, the importance for the nation at large rests in the fact that honesty and fidelity have been shown deficient in the character of a person appointed to represent us in high matters of state. From Mr Anthony Smith, QC Sir, Yours is not a little paper run by a dated chique of aging public schoolboys raising laughs and circulation out of the follies of others. Because we all commit folly of some kind, it is easy enough for others to talk up such folly indiscriminately to destroy. On the part of the supposedly responsible this can be intellectual vandalism.

In my judgment few politicians of any party inspire by appearances much admiration for real ability. For this observer, Mr Parkinson's appearances have for some years constituted a notable exception to that rule. I would not have thought the manifestation of honesty, or love, or loyalty, or even of sin that is supposed to be original and in us all, reveals such startling defects of character as to make him less fit to serve the rest of us now than he was when we did not know. In this age of vaunted permissive-ness and liberalism, when even what was recently thought unnatural vice can be condoned as real love from can be contoned as real love from the pulpit, there are still ways for establishment journals to make Pamells and Dilkes. I am disap-pointed that your paper, after all these years, should give the appear-ance of seeking them out.

A defence would have been more impressive. It would have been more useful, perhaps, to those whose sufferings you lament, too. Yours sincerely. ANTHONY SMITH Skeffington House, Skeffington, Leicester.

Cenotaph ceremony

From Mr J. M.: Rex Sir, I find Mr Wheldon's letter (September 30) and his frustration understandable, but inappropriate. His motivation, bowever, seems exclusively political. Those who died are, at one and the same time the nation's dead, yet unpossessable. They belong to no political party.

There are still many opportunities to honour them, privately, in churches and at other ceremonies throughout this country each November, in addition to the honour and recognition paid by the Head of State at the Cenotaph.

On the wrong tack? From Lord Brabason of Tara

Sir, I feel I must protest at Sir Eric St Johnston's letter (October 1) propos-ing the burying of the America's Cup and the scrapping of 12-metre racing. The series gave many people all over the world a great deal of excitement and enjoyment, as well visited Rhode Island to see it.

In an age when so many sportsmen seem to demand a ubsidy from taxpayer or ratepaye before taking to their chosen field. and there are so many so willing to distribute largesse providing some-one else is paying, it is, I agree, unfashionable for someone actually to want to spend his own money in the attempted fulfilment of a dream. Sir Eric suggests each country which has built a 12-metre should build two sail-training ships, but they were all built by individuals or syndicates, not by countries.

Nowadays everything is related to the number of jobs it may create:
£5m is not a bad start; just think what would have happened if Victory 83 had won and the next series had come to Britain, and how many training ships would have been funded by the spin-offs. Well done, Mr de Savary, and let's hope you have another go next time, and

Young offenders

From Mr Maurice Logan-Salton Sir, There is an effect of the increase in the numbers of juveniles receiv-ing custodial sentences which is not

Since 1980 this country has lost most of its finest boarding schools for problematic youngsters, particularly those young offenders who nowadays are simply sent to detention centres and youth custody centres. In Scotland the schools are known as List D Schools, while in England and Wales they are called Community Homes with Education (CHEs). These boarding schools represented the positive approach to those youngsters deemed by the courts to need to spend a period away from their homes, and as such were a major national resource in the fight against crime.

In this country, we have so far taken only a few faltering steps along that path. Surely the evidence is that we need more of the same; so, why leave it to the private sector? Over the same 15-month period, the Government took £2.4bn out of the economy, thereby pulling against the direction so enthusiastically taken

From the Reverend Prebendary R. A.

Sir, I have much sympathy with Mr C. Hammond's plea (October 4) for inner-city churches which provide "a setting within which the liturgy can be enacted most expressive and fulfilled most completely" and I share his concern about the liturgical and architectural merit of modern churches and the replacement "worship centres". However, it must be said that the inner areas of our great cities have simply too many churches. The great majority were built between 1850 and 1900, often at the whim of individual priests or donors who and economic facts of the 1980s.

in the London Borough of Camden there are 32 Anglican parish churches, serving a popu-lation which has halved since most of those churches were built. Many Christians would find it hard to justify the retention of all these churches and, leaving aside ques-tions of staffing and other pastoral considerations, the Church can no longer provide adequate finance for their proper upkeep.
If all the inner-city churches are to be kept, even as architectural "signs", then substantial financial resources must be found from non-Church sources. We do appreciate the love and self-sacrifice of small devoted congregations, but should the upkeep of buildings be the first call on their efforts? I have personal experience of a parochial church council which, after years of unequal struggle, voted unanimously to have their church declared redundant.

That congregation is now part of a living Christian community worshipping in another building. They have gained by their courageous decision. Redundancy and demolition can lead to growth in the. church of the inner city. Yours faithfully,

Great Autumn Show in the old and new Westminster halls is magnifi-cent. Although held later in the year than usual, because of the reno-Horton', creamy pink and named after the watercolour artist, 'Por-celain', a delicate lilac and white, waiton of the new hall, this year's weird weather has brought less autumn colour than expected. Perhaps because of that there is an unusually wide range of interesting plants on display, from house plants, bonsai trees, rock garden and alpine subjects, roses, dahlias, chrysanthemums, grey foliage plants and succulents, to many trees and shrubs.

The judges awarded eight gold medals to exhibits of special merit. The three dahlia exhibitors staged superb gold medal displays. even months into its term, the new Australian Labour government, the first since Mr Gough Whitlam's administration, has avoided the mistakes, turmoil and shoot-from-the-hip style that characterized the Whitlam years.

There has not been the flurry of legislation, initiatives and pronouncements which marked the last Labour term. While the watchword in Canberra now is evolution rather than revolution, the difference between the last Labour government and Mr Bob Hawke's administration is also as much a matter of style

The Prime Minister's team has made some faux pas - the "spy" flight over Tasmania at the time of the Franklin dam row and the dispute with the chairman of the Australian Broadcasting Commission (as it then was) come to mind - but none of them was allowed to develop into a major issue. Mr Hawke acted raidly and effectively to dampen any possible

The most significant matter, which has marred an otherwise fine record, has been the Coombe-Ivanov affair, and there too Mr Hawke acted rapidly and ruthlessly in seeking, and obtaining, the resignation of Mr Mick Young, the Special Minister for State, and a close personal confidant. By that action the Prime Minister made it clear that he was not going to allow the actions of an individual to embarrass his government, something which happened all too often under Mr Whitlam.

The Royal Commission, cstablished by Mr Hawke to look into the affair and Mr David Coombe's relationship with Mr Valeriy Ivanov, a Soviet diplomat, has proved an Encouraging hi-tech industries

So far there are few signs that Labour will be any more able to reduce unemployment than its predecessors. There was an imperceptible drop in the number of jobless in the most recent quarterly figures but hardly anything to warrant

Unemployment is unlikely to improve until the world economy picks up and then not necessarily significantly. Australia, in common with similar industrialized nations, faces the problem of aging inefficient industries. The problem is compounded in Australia's case by its being a country with a high-wage structure in the midst of a low-wage cost region.

Any wage explosion, as well as jeopardizing Labour's economic recovery programme, will rekindle memories of the last Labour government and the runaway inflation of the Whitlam era. That, more than any other single point, gave Mr Malcolm Fraser his biggest stick against Labour.

This fear of precipitating another inflationary spiral has undoubtedly influenced Mr Hawke's approach. Under Mr Whitiam, inflation reached more than 17 per cent, fired by a free-spending public

The government, also aware of Australia's industrial shortcomings, has taken a number of initiatives to encourage the high technology sector with generous tax concessions for investors in high-risk industries. However, in some areas, particularly computers and related products, Barry Jones, the Minister for Science and Technology, believes that it is already too late for Australia. He says the country has "missed the boat".

> Mine and farm are big export earners

While long-term prospects lie in new industries, mining and agriculture will remain Australia's major carners of export income.

Mr Hawke faces opposition from within the Labour Party and from the unions over uranium mining and government's attitude to Indonesia over East Timor.

The party's policy on unanium, agreed to after extremely tormous negotiations, in which Mr Hawke played a leading role, is that existing mines should be allowed to fulfil contracts entered into but that no new contracts should be signed or new mines started. except where uranium exists with other minerals. Ultimately the policy commits Labour to phase out the industry.

Mr Hawke has now said that he feels existing mines should be allowed to negotiate new overseas contracts to enable them to dispose of their production. This is a liberal interpretation of the letter of the party policy, if not the spirit.

Mr Hawke further angered the anti-uranium lobby by criticizing the demonstrators who blockaded the Roxby Downs mine in South Australia in August. Speaking in Tasma-nia he said: "You see some of the same faces there as were here (protesting against the Franklin dam in Tasmania)." The phrase was reminiscent of a more conservative government.

The Prime Minister has already received two warnings from the party and its backers on the uranium question. The Victoria branch of the party warned the government not to water down its policy and the Australian Council of Trade Unions also told the government not to soften its line. Mr Hawke has, apparently, ignored both warnings.

On foreign policy Mr Hawke has ignored party policy on the East Timor question and has accepted as fact Indonesia's takeover of the former Portuguese colony, again angering both wings of the party. The East Timor issue is one that soured Australia's relations with its nearest and largest neigh-bour, particularly because of the five newsmen killed by Indonesian troops during fighting following the Djakarta take-

Captivated by the Queen Mother

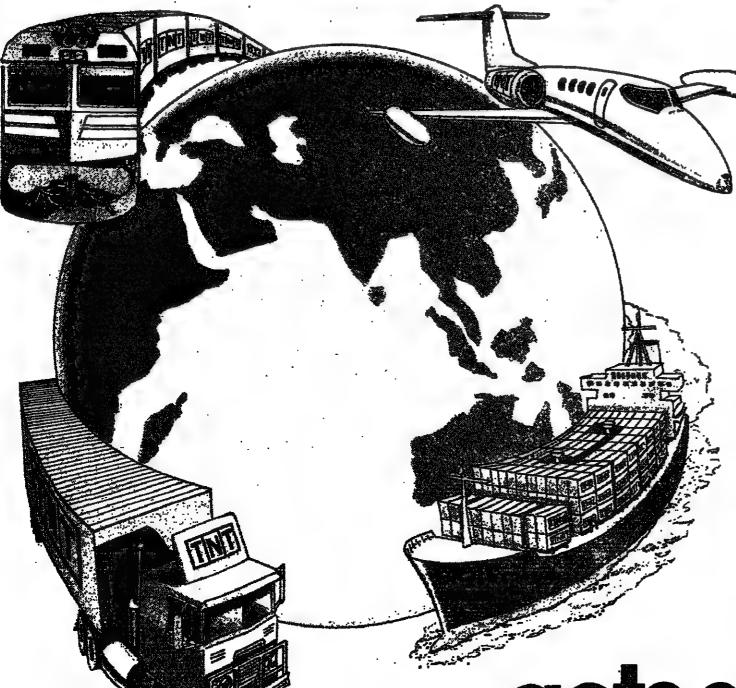

Mr Hawke again attracted some criticism, although of a milder nature, when he went to London and was seen by Australian television viewers to be captivated by the Queen Mother. The obvious pleasure he showed in her Company did not quite fit in with his previously stated republican

Mr Hawke has been described as representing a new breed of politician. That may be true, but the problems he faces are not new; they are similar to ones faced by virtually every leader in the Western world, It remains to be seen whether he can provide the leadership and new direction that Australia seeks to lift it out of the depression. It is unlikely that any recent Australian political leader has come to power with such high hopes. The size of the task Mr Hawke has shouldered is enormous and is likely to be matched only by the disappointment among his followers should he fail.

In 1956 TNT began as a one truck transportation business.

Since then, we've grown to become one of the world's most successful international transportation groups with revenues up from $9 million in 1961 to more than $1450 million today.

A workforce of over 27,000 dedicated people provides a comprehensive range of transport services offering door-to-door delivery of goods under the control of a single organisation, with all forwarding formalities covered by a single consignment note.

Our freight network has grown to reach across the United Kingdom, Continental Europe, Canada, Australasia, the US, Brazli, the Middle East, Africa and South-East Asia. Our range of services has grown to cover these fields:

- Land transportation services including overnight express and door-to-door radio-controlled courier deliveries.
- Airline operations
- International sea and freight forwarding
- Cold storage/and warehousing of bonded consignments
- Container leasing
- Pallet and fork lift truck services

With the opening of "The Hub" — the most modern freight transport terminal in the United Kingdom, we can now service the greater part of the U.K. on an overnight basis. And, as we continue to expand, crossing new geographic and national barriers, our customers are discovering an amazing fact. When It comes to freight forwarding and transportation, as TNT gets bigger, the world

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

The Hawke government had to address itself to the issue of foreign investment only three at the polls. In the run-up to the March 5 election more than $A3,000m (£1,818m) had fled the country, and on March 8 the government was forced to devalue the Australian dollar by 10 per cent to restore some sanity to the domestic money market and stability to Austra-

Perhaps more to the point, however, is the fear of being controlled by outside forces, of having control and sovereignty diminished by an interest incompatible with Australia's perceived national inter-est. It was these concerns which led the Whitlam government (1972-1975) to seak billions of petro-dollars, not through its fiscal agent of long standing (Morgan Stanley), but via Tirath Khemlani, who was indicted by a federal grand jury in New York for conspiracy in 1980.

On being elected, the government faced heavy ompleted by the end of budgetary problems and its Treasurer, while a politician of formidable acumen, was unschooled in economics. He had a budget to present only five months after his appointment.

In July last year the Labour Party held its biennial federal conference. This conference is the supreme policy-making organ of the party, and what it decides is meant, at least in theory, to be binding on a federal Labour government. However, that was mostly a chimera. Oil prices fell and drought struck the rural areas. That could not be helped. But Australia has also had a burst of economic mismanagement and bloody-mindedness unmatched since the Whitlam-Cairns era of 1973-75.

The outcome was: inflation now running at double the OECD rate; a federal budget deficit of nearly $A8,400m (£5,000m) or 4.7 per cent of gdp; unemployment at 10.3 per cent and officially forecast to rise in 1983-84; corporate profitabi-lity reduced to the lowest postwar level and no rise in private investment or self-sustaining

The current target is 9-11 per cent (M3), still disturbingly high. Meanwhile the floor being set under interest rates by government funding needs, makes a recovery of private investment less likely - the normal problem with government-led recoveries.

> Corporate gross operating surpluses (profits, before inter-est and direct tax) fell 17 per cent in real terms in 1982, and after-interest surpluses would have fallen even more sharply. Even after the slight rises in profitability in the past half year, the health of the corporate sector is close to its lowest point on record, the previous nadir being 1974.

In manufacturing output in 1982-83 tumbled 11 per cent, far exceeding the previous notorious decline of 1974-75. Housing construction sank by 25 per cent, but this has now revived as a result of all the money that the government has thrown at it. The revival of manufacturing is not yet predictable though surveys of levels of confidence are just starting to register an important

The cpi forecast is misleading because the budget shifts some health costs from the private sector to the government, and the inflation outlook using the broader-based deflators is a less rosy It per cent. One reason for the Australia's trading partners, is the rise in food prices in the wake of the drought. Another is government price rises for services. The March devaluation is also contributing.

There is a saying on Australian farms that "mud's money". The great drought of 1981-83 ensured little of either. The drought, in conjunction with depressed world prices and high cost inflation, lopped real incomes from farming by 53 per cent in 1982-83, the biggest fall

The good rains in the past few months (100 good along the Queensland border, which was flooded) make a record wheat harvest likely in 1983-84. For farming as a whole, incomes are, Agricultural Economics to rise by 110 per cent to $A4,400m. (£2,619m), with rural exports to rise by 10 per cent to about $A8,000m. In more detail, crop production should rise by 48 per cent, with prices up 6 per cent, while a 4 per cent drop in livestock products will be easily offset by a rise of 20 per cent in prices. The output figures are all conservative owing to the recent upgrading of forecasts of

MINING

Digging deeper for new markets

Even a limited inspection of Australia's vast mineral and mining industries can be a. daunting task which takes you across the continent, sometimes through inhospitable and barely sible regions.

However, the heady days of far-flung and enthusiastic development are over for the time being and "quarry" Australia, domestic and world pressures, is having to face up to tough times. A visitor to iron and coal mines these days finds much belt-tightening and fretting about cutbacks.

"This is one of the most difficult times in our history," says Mr John Wruck, a senior executive of Utah Development Company, the biggest coking coal producer in Australia. which is about to be taken over by Australia's largest industrial company, Broken Hill Pro-prietary (BHP).

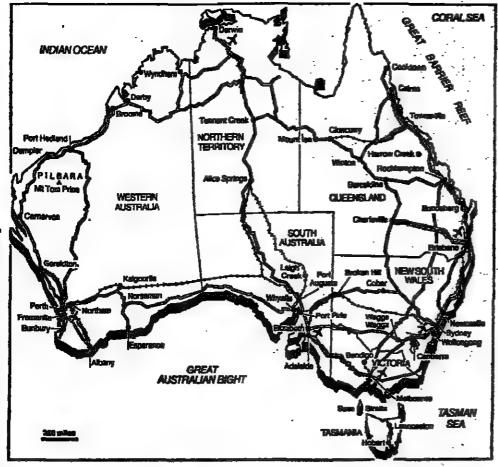

The immediate problems are largely the result of a prolonged worldwide recession. The iron ore and coal businesses have been especially hard-hit. Other metals - Australia produces ium, bauxite, antimony, asbestos, chrysolite, bismuth, copper, gold, lead, manganese, sands, natural gas, phosphate, silver, tin, n, uranium and zinc have suffered in varying de-

Australia, however, faces a longer-term challenge, so far tackled only half-heartedly. Since none of its resources monopolize the world market, the country must open up new markets and maintain its international cost competitiveness in old ones, at a time when whatever advantages it once possessed are being whittled

Australian minors are barnpered by high inflation (still double-digit), a fickle labour force organized along Byzantine lines which at the same time unrest, and governments - state and federal - which have strongly supported develop-ment, but which at the same tend to consider underground resources as a comucopia created for tax purposes only.

The problems include high technold levels of direct texation, and indirect levies such as high rail ground.

sometimes privately financed, rail links. The current federal government would like rationalize the taxation of resources, and has proposed a resource rent tax in vague terms, which could be based on, say, a minimum rate of return on investments.

The intention in theory be to replace other, somewhat arbitrary, tax schemes which now exist. State reluctant to turn more control of taxes over to the federal vernment. And busin fear that any new tax plan, despite good intentions, will result ultimately in more and net less teas

Australian businessmen can no longer be complacent about their ability to market what they can mine. Gone are the days when billion-dollar development efforts could be supported on the basis of long-term contracts with Japan, Japan's steel and power industries are pressing hard to cut back and save on contracts. Australian businessmen are having to sharpen their negotiating skills. They are also scrambling to diversify into new markets, none of which looks onite as fat and profitable as in the past.

New and old customers are becoming more fickle about quality control and consistency of supplies. Miners must know these days about technology than simply how to dig the raw material out of the Karratha, built to support mine development in Western Australia's arid northwest, a twin-engine Beechcraft takes about 40 minutes to cross a seemingly endless reddish-brown expanse of desolate wilderness, dotted with scrawny trees, to arrive in iron

The destination, Hammersley Iron's Mount Tom Price, the richest deposit of ore in the Pilbara, looms below like a castle. Its man-made contours testify to tens of millions of tons of ore which have already been carted by train nearly 250 miles to a seaside port, and then to blast furnaces, mainly in Japan.

Hammersley is operating at 36 million tons a year, against appeals of 39 million tons in 1980, and its sales are running at only 31 million tons, Paradoxically, recent industrial disputes stoppages have posed the problem of maintaining enough stocks, more than 60 per cent of which go to Japan, to load onto incoming ore carriers at the port

More than 1,800 miles to the east, in the sprawling Bowen basin of Queensland, one of the largest coal discoveries in the world is being systematically dug from the earth. However, production at Utah Development's Harrow Creek is being deliberately restrained because and for coking coal accessible coal, nearest the surface, is also down. Utah's production is running 6.5 million toos below its 22 million tops of annual capacity. reducing stocks somewhat, mines are faced with the prospect of 20 million tons of new annual capacity of coal coming on stream in Canada and elsewhere around the world by next year, further tipping the nines are in Australia itself. where a sure in demand from Japan since the 1970s encouraged a massive amount of investment for both coking coal, used to make steel, and steaming coal as an energy alternative to oil.

The poor market situation was certainly borne out in price negotiations with Japan this year, when contract prices were about 20 per cent below last year. Negotiations on longererm contracts now coming into force are due shortly, and Japan is putting on pressure for price reductions on these as well.

British millionaire racehorse-owner, first arrived in Australia about 10 years also, he thought it rather quaint that the country's biggest race was a two-mile handicap.

Mr Sangster, by his own admission, had a bit to learn about Australians and their racing and it took him until 1980, when he won the Melbourne Cup, to fully under-stand. He described the discovery, that day at Fleming-ton racecourse, as "the thrill of "This is better than Epsom or Paris," he said. "This is a win of the heart. That's what the Melbourne Cup is all about -tradition and feeling."

The Cup is indeed the heartbeat of Australian racing, even though it is common for horses with the limited ability of Mr Sangster's Beldale Ball to win. The Derby and other threemportant, but not in the way that they are in aimost every other country in the world. Comparisons between Australia and elsewhere are virtually way it is approached, is so different.

Consider the following:

 Weight-for-age (wfa) racing may be the most glamorous section of the sport, but it still does not have the general appeal of a major handicap. More than once in recent years Australia's best horses, with a string of wfa victories behind them, have not been able to win full public acclaim until proving themselves in major-habdicape.

Australian racing in many ways, is a game for young men and for people who have never had much luck. The foresight of Mr Sangster enabled him to penetrate the industry so quickly, that in only a few years he became the biggest owner in the country. But there are literally thousands of small owners.

The best example again comes from Mr Sangster. On one of his early visits he strolled into a Melbourne hotel and was asked by the porters how they should go about leasing a horse. Owners in Australia are spread throughout the community. Even porters can race horses.

There are even better examples. Manifesto, the out-standing Australian sprinter of the last ten years and winner of more than $A1 million in stake money, cost $A3,500 as a yearling. Kingston Town, win-ner of close to $A2 million and Australasian record holder, was offered for sale as a yearling and comid not reach his reserve of $A5,000.

Three years ago Mr Sangster found out first hand about the opportunities for even the favourite for Victoria's premier sprint, the Newmarket, but his runner, Sportscast, could finish only second to one of the rank

Building bridges to rescue Brazil

When Mr Paul Volcker, once the commercial loan chairman of the US Federal restructuring was in place. Reserve Board, said in Honolulu that Brazil may need bridging finance to tide it over, even if everyone agrees to the $11 billion rescue package now being assembled, he was doing no more than stating the obvious.

Heavy government borrow-ing has also proved a problem The likelihood of a bridge loan being needed has been apparent for some first six months of the 1983-84 financial year, central government borrowed £8,842m, comtime to many bankers and government officials. At present Brazil is cut off same period last year. In from external finance; as September alone, central government borrowed £1,155m the rescue package has become more complex, so it compared with £307m a year has become increasingly Much of this extra borrowing has replaced loans from private

Until there are firm commitments from commercial banks to provide their $6.5 billion share of the $11 billion required through to the end of next year and until Brazil has agreed to the International Monetary Fund's economic measures, there is little prospect of the country receiving new funds from any source

Putting the pieces of this complex jigsaw together is going to take some time. Even if commercial banks agree in principle to stump up the extra money required, it will be some time before the funds can be

In the meantime, US banks will be getting increasingly worried about interest arrears and nonperforming loans and the problem of Brazil meeting IMF targets will also arise egain.

Brazil may, for instance, be unable to meet IMF targets for the fourth quarter of this year on building up reserves and reducing interest arrears if new funds are delayed too long. For these reasons a bridging loan looks not so much likely as essential and the more interesting aspect of Mr Volcker's remarks was the hint he gave that the US government might be prepared to contribute. Asked about US government participation, Mr Voicker said the matter would have to be looked at easy.

It would be unwise to read too much into this. A big bridging operation by Western governments, for instance, looks unlikely at this stage.

The British Government has already annoyed the British banks and caused embarrassment in Threadneedle Street by refusing to chip in to another element of the $11 biliion package = the S2.5 billion of govenment guarantees for trade credits - so it is hard to see the British Government for one taking part in a bridging loan.

There is also a marked reluctance in Washinton to the idea of bridging into the S6.5 billion commercial bank loan. US officials stress that before any bridging finance could be provided, there must be a clear means of repayment at the end of the loan and in the past such operations have generally been arranged to allow repayment from IMF disbursements.

However, the scope for a bridging loan of this sort is limited simply because once the IMF resumes disbursing blocked loans to Brazil. the money will have to go to repaying the long-overdue bridging loan from the Bank for International Settlements

At the end of the day, therefore, the burden of providing bridging finance to Brazil is likely to be shoved firmly back at the commercial banks. Mr Volcker's remarks may be taken as an indication that the US government will be prepared to participate but it is likely to expect the commercial banks to provide the lion's share.

In the meantime, ever, much work still needs to be done to ensure that finance is not simply academic. The immediate challenge in the days and weeks ahead is to persuade hundreds of reluctant banks to contribute towards the $6.5 billion commercial banks loan. It is not going to be

The profit before taxation for the first half of 1983 was 60 per cent, higher than for the same period last year. Earnings per share increased by 80 per cent. and exceeded those for the whole of last year. A reduction in interest paid of £1.5 million resulted from the combined effects of lower interest rates and much reduced borrowings.

All major activities in the United Kingdom have improved their profits. Whilst the market in

These results demonstrate that the effect of the actions taken to improve profitability are now

In-fighting overshadows sugar price talks

Sugar prices have shown a certain resilience in the aftermath of the in-fighting which Geneva talks on the future of the International Sugar Agreement, but it seems unlikely that the price will rise much above its present range of 9 cents to 12 cents a nound.

This is hardly an encouraging background for the negotiations between key members of the ISA, due to resume in London next month.

In this market, at least, the fundamentals appear to hold sway reasonably. After surplusjust under 9 million tonnes in 1981-82 and 6.5 million tonnes in 1982 -83, the present crop year should result in a deficit of about 1.5 million tonnes on production of between 92 million and 93 million tonnes. The outcome is largely the esult of bad weather in South Africa, Australia, and the European Community, and might have been expected to

But three factors have militated against a price rise. The first is simply that the market has already discounted the possibility of a rare supply blame for undermining deficit. The extent of the transformttion of the group from a shoe manufacturing, distribution and engineering concern to a foot-wear retailing operation is shown in the interim balance sheet which shows a 40 per cent rise in pretax profits to £2.1m, compared with the same stage last year. Turnover in the six months to June 30 grew by 50 per cent to £79.2m.

Footwear retailing produced 37 per cent of group profits nsi 7 per cent a year ago. Much of the increase stems from the acquisitions of the Turner and Frisby shoe stores chains in British and the addition of the Hofheimer stores in the US.

This brings the British operation to a £50m a year turnover, 370-store business, with the additional 113 stores in the US. The shoe retailing trade traditionally provides two-

Confidence the future

In his annual statement to shareholders, Mr. F. V. Waller, Chairman of Adwest Group, reports improved pre-tax profits of £6.84m compared with £5.97m - an increase of 14.6%. The increase would have been higher had not there been a loss of £560,000 incurred by the Group's French subsidiary. A total dividend for the year of 9.1p per share is recommended (1982-8.25p) and a one-for-two borus After reviewing the activities of the Group's subsidiaries,

Mr. Waller concludes: "The industrial recession which has affected this country since 1980 appears to have bottomed out. The economy of the United States is reviving and that should be reflected in Europe. The forward order position on our automotive companies has improved and we hope this improvement will be sustained during this financial year. The new equipment we have introduced over the past few years, the efficiencies we have obtained from restructuring of our companies and the reduction of overheads should combine with the growth in the economy to increase our profits in the On a number of occasions since the recession started in 1980, we have seen signs of an upturn which have not been sustained. However, this year we look forward with more confidence than we have previously, and all the present indications are that this year will show an improvement on Copies of the Annual Report, containing the Chairman's

Reagan's lesson on public spending from a strong ally view that big budget deficits are his influential audiences in not the cause of high interest recent weeks that the Treasury rates and that both will has completed a comprehensive gradually disappear once the recovery moves into high gear.

Mr Reagan's strict adherence to this view has triggered a sharp split with his Administration particularly among Cabinet officials who agree with Mrs Thatcher that big structural deficits do cause high interest rates and are therefore a threat to the world recovery.

Thatcher said that the $200bn US deficit threatened Britain's recovery

But the Administration's official line, as stated in addresses across the country by Mr Regan, the president's handpicked spokesman on economic matters, bas reunchanged despite alarining contradictory statements by Mr Martin Feldstein, the chief economic adviser.

has completed a comprehensive study which showed clearly that there was no historical relation between big budget deficits and high interest rates.

Although the study has been criticized as "thin" and weak on supporting data, Mr Regan has attempted to cite its conclusions as sound reason for his decision to try to talk down interest rates rather than reduce them by cutting the federal deficit with But Mr Feldstein has told groups across the country that the "reason for the very high level of long-term rates is undoubtedly the unprecedented level of the budget deficits now predicted for the years ahead". Mr Feldstein said his most recent estimates indicated that the outstanding volume of public debt will more than double between now and 1988. "For the public to absorb this debt, a sharp rise in interest rates will be required," added Speaking as a friend and Indeed, Mr Regan has told strong supporter, Mrs Thatcher also gave warning that the $200ba plus American deficit threatened Britain's nascent recovery by keeping interest rates "at higher levels than they should be"

She said at a farewell press conference that she wanted to impress on President Reagan that this was bad news for Britain and for Europe's prospects generally. Given the fact that Mrs Thatcher shares many of President Reagan's free-market views, her advice to take the politically unpopular step of raising taxes decidedly impressed the President, White House officials said.

From anyone else the advice would have been ignored by Reagan

"I don't know that it changed his views, but he is listening more intently to those arguing for tax increases", one official Mrs Thatcher told the Presi-dent and cabinet officials that she learnt an important lesson about taxes during her first big unable to reduce the rate of public spending sufficiently and also wanted to cut direct tax rates sharply.

To do this, the Prime Minister said she had to take the politically unpopular step of raising the indirect lax rate by pushing through sharp increases in value-added tax to 15 per

As a result of this offsetting action and other tough stands on takes taken in 1981, public borrowing as a share of gross domestic product dropped shar-ply from an estimated 5 per cent in 1980 to 3 per cent in 1981-82 and 2.75 per cent in 1982-83. Conversely, American public borrowing as a share of gross national product stood at a high level of almost 6 per cent in 1983, fact that has raised the spectre of a debilitating interest rate crunch when private demand for credit grows as the recovery picks up.

These fears have increased in recent weeks, resulting in appeals from both Democrats and Republicans for the defict to be reduced through moderate

But President Reagan has so far rejected these appeals, saying that the Administration will not put forward tax legislation of its own despite earlier statements that it would attempt to raise new revenues with a 5 per cent tax surcharge and an oil tax in 1886

Leaders in both houses of congress have said they will no move legislation to raise $75b in new taxes over a three-yer period, as called for in the 198 budget resolution, unless 11. President moves first.

The resulting deadlock has kept interest rates high as financial markets digest the news that inaction will result in deficits estimated at $196bn in 1984 fiscal year $205bn in 1985, and $214bn by 1986.

At this point, it is unlikely that any tax legislation will be moved until after the presidential elections, given the political constraints and the President's resistence. The only thing that could move the process forward is a groundswell of support for the domestic summit resol-ution, which has been sponsored by almost 100 members of the House of Representatives and is expected to vote soon. If - as expected - it is passed resoundingly, the Senate would probably pass a similar measure calling for action on the deficit within 45 days and the President, prodded by Mrs Thatcher's remarks, would be under great pressure to comply.

Industrial Protebook

Reining in on the cowboys

ing, which industry produces the most complaints and his response will be instant - the home improvements business.

market has rocketed in the last decade. Even official statistics say it has grown by over 25 per cent and that takes no account of "builders" who work for cash to beat the taxman. It is this "cowboy" end of the trade which swells Borrie's postbag. Thirty years 2go, house-holds outnumbered dwellings by almost a million. Today, they are more or less in balance, but more than 4 million homes are estimated to be in serious disrepair. The accent has thus switched from the building programmes of the 1960s towards maintaining and improving the present stock. What many households spent 20 years ago in buying new homes they may now spend in improving an older home. Building societies lend liberally for home improve-ments and local authorities offer generous grants. The sums involved are large in relation to the budget of an ardinary household. Saving 15 er cent VAT on, say, a £3,000 -roofing job, plus perhaps a t more for cash and the fact at your builder is avoiding s statutory liabilities, looks conthwatering. But there is no armal comeback for the stranded householder. Sir Gordon himself has published his recommendations for tackling the problem in his Report on Home Improvements. The construction industry is encouraged to offer warranty schemes to protect its customers. Yet ironically the biggest hurdle the industry has faced in producing a genuine and effective scheme has been the fair trading law itself: How does a warranty scheme applied with teeth avoid being a restrictive trade practice? Commonsense is at last prevailing on that point and the industry is developing more effective warranty schemes. But the ultimate test will be in their take-up by households and sources of households' finance could could Ask Sir Gordon Borrie, Many local authorities and Director-General of Fair Trad-financial institutions welcome warranty schemes for their home improvement loan and grant applicants. Sir Gordon goes one further and recommends that the banks and building societies should consider tying their loans to warranty-backed works. He makes similar suggestions for local authority grants. And he would reinforce this demandside constraint with a statutory "duty to trade fairly".

How seriously will the Government and the financial institutions take Sir Gordon's recommendations? The crude over-riding of the OFT in the Stock Exchange case raises doubts as to how kindly this free enterprise Conservative administration takes to applying the strict logic of a fair-

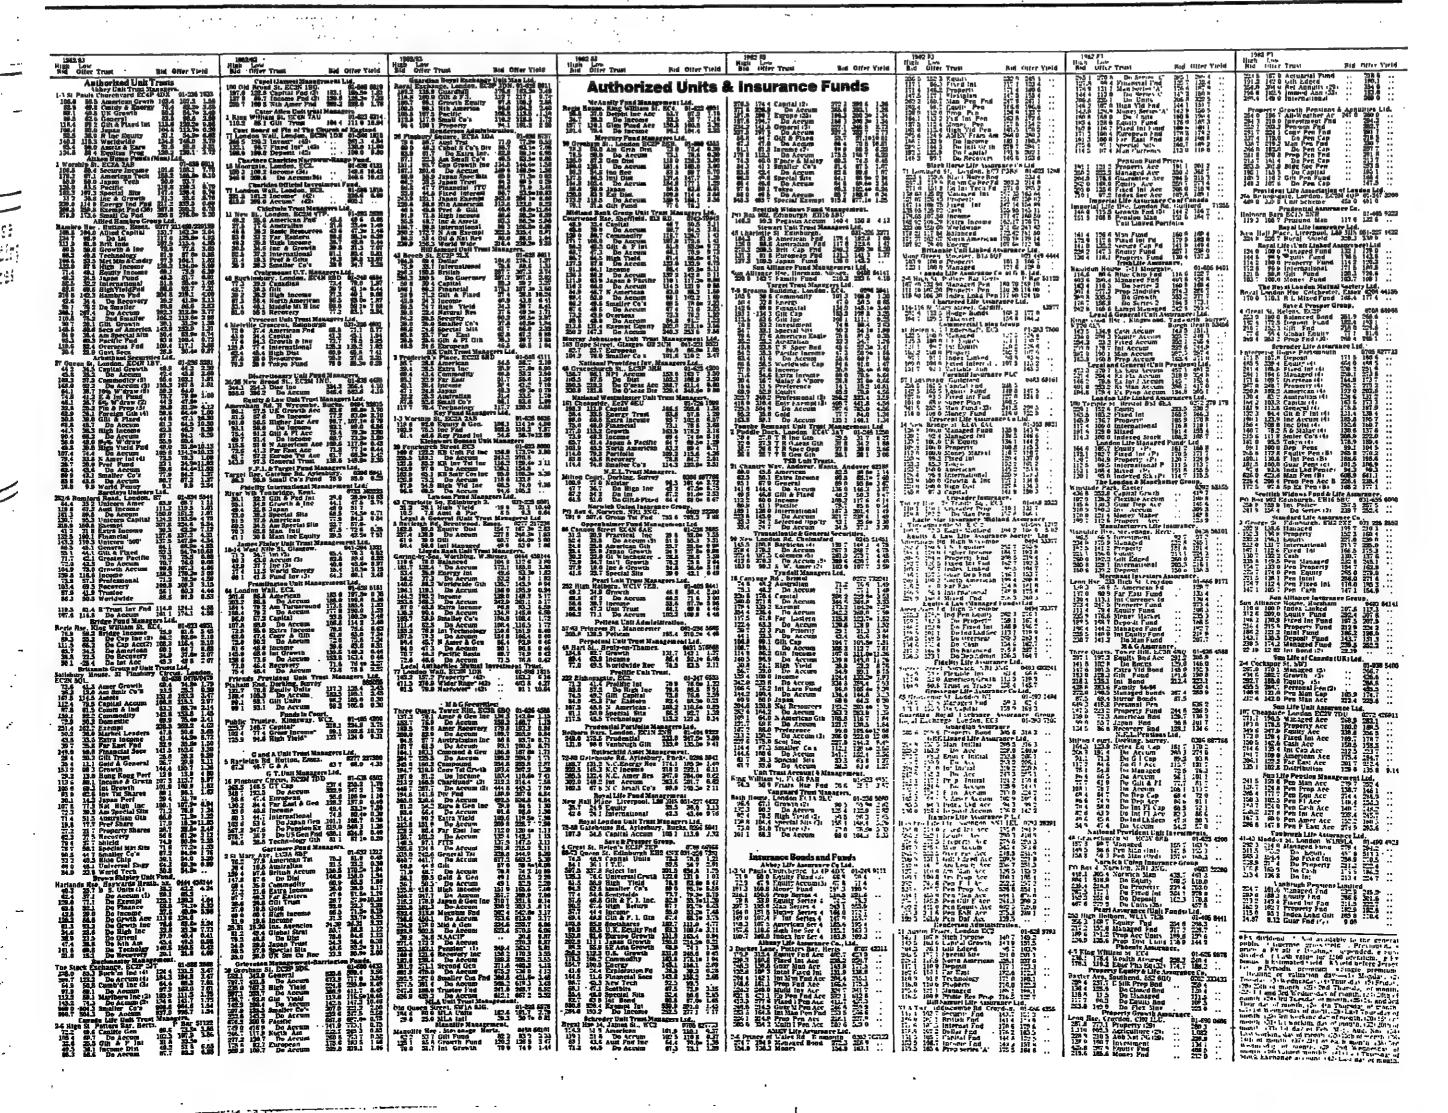

Will the OFT's home improvement dations receive equally short shrift, as Conservative minis-ters secretly delight in the buccaneer spirit of the small cash-trading one-man-band builder? Or will the chickens of the bome improvement lungle come home to roost, in the form of more constituents' complaints, and send ministers scurrying to lean on the financial institutions and local authorities to tighten the tests

An excellent working example already exists in the new homes market where an NHBC quality certificate is the essential passport to a building society mortgage.

What the NHBC has done in the past 20 years for the quality and image of new housebuilding, the construction industry now hopes to do market with its more effective warranty schemes. But NHBC would not have done so without being tied closely to the sources of finance. The same will apply to home improvement.

Mr Robert Thornton, chair-man of Debenhams, made his views known at a meeting of the Society of Investment Analysts. The shares greeted the news with a jump of 5p to 140p, after hitting 142p.

According to analysts attending the meeting, the rationale behind the move is to realize the group's valuable assets, more accurately, while spreading the risk against an unwanted bid approach. Since the successful bid for UDS Group by Hanson Trust, Debenhams has been strongly tipped as the next big stores group to come under the hammer.

Last year Mr Thornton took the step of splitting the group up into 18 separate divisions controlled by a holding com-pany. These included a property company, Welbeck Finance and the catering interests, Even if breaking performance overnight Debenhams sold off small parts on Wall Street. Investors re-

Robson take a gamble on a European championship night

Chips down in a high stakes game

England will return to an old Hungarian fort this evening to play for familiarly high stakes. Two years ago in the Nep Stadium they gambled with their own respectability as well as their ambitions of reaching the World Cup finals, and it paid off. Now only the eventual prize, a place among the last eight in the European championships,

Bobby Robson, whose representa-tives are holding on to the last chip of hope in-group three, admits that "the situation is almost identical". In 1981, Switzerland had embarrassed England the week before they came here and the recent defeat by Denmark has left the current side with the same "need to restore credibility", a matter seen almost as important as the outcome

Robson, in being "prepared to lose a game to win it", has taken a chance. Among the 11 he chose yesterday was Hoddle, whose gifts are doubted by none, but whose application is doubted by all. To reduce the risk, Robson has built around him a solid wall of protection and selected three widfield. protection and selected three midfield biters", in Bryan Robson, Lee and Hoddle has, therefore, been given a glorious opportunity to display his lalents on the one hand, and a heavy burden of responsibility on the other. Untimely injuries may have limited his international appearances in the past, but a spacious stage has now been prepared for his benefit, and he must accept the challenge. On his reaction England's fate may depend.

The other doubt in Robson's mind concerns the availability of Sansom, who is only 90 per cent fit. After suffering a slight reoccurrence of his back problem, his movement is restricted, but he hopes to play. A stern test in the morning will prove whether he or Kennedy starts as left back.

Once Robson had decided to strengthen the midfield, the rest of his formation was predictable. Gregory, although he must be considered the fifth choice, is the most experienced right back in the party and Martin and Butcher as a combination at the centre of England's defence have yet to finish on the losing side.

The record of the partnership between Blissett and Mariner is not so encouraging. They have been paired once before, in the 2-1 victory over graceful passes into open territory, It is up to the likes of Lee, coming in from the right, Mabbutt, from the left, and Bryan Robson, in the centre, to act as "It is crucial to concentrate on our own game," Robson said, "and we must get the best out of our players and our style. If we do all of that right, then they will have to worry about us." His opinion was scarcely the same three weeks ago, when he was praising the Danes before they arrived.

Nevertheless, he was eager to see the Hungarian side when it was announced and to hear the views of a local reporter. Kovacs, the goalkeeper for instance, has been picked only once before and that it was some six years people as well as football, is the character of the youngsters.

Of course England has fewer great footballers today, but se has almost every country: and that is because small boys spend less time between the age of six and 12 learning how to use the ball and to balance themselves. The problem for England is what happens to our young players by the time they reach the sanior team.

We have too much commetitive

We play too much competitive football at international level, never mind at school and in professional clubs, so that we are too often scuffling for points against Greece of Malta insead of allowing players to develop. Stewart on trial

In Stewart, Northern Ireland's given us a nice impetus. But he has volatile young winger will be to learn that losing your temper is reminded to keep out of trouble in both foolish and immanure. Sammy Mcliroy, Stoke City's midfield player will watch over Stewart and keep his mind on producing the match-winning skills that have put the Irish on the fringe

Stewart was booked against Austria last month and another flash of temper will rule him out of next month's game with West Germany, which looks increasingly like the group decider. "I'm determined to behave," he said. "But it gets a bit hard when you are chopped down for the fourth and fifth time. That's when I feel myself boiling over. But it's a reassurance to know Sammy's always there. to know Sammy's always there, keeping a grip. He's a great influence if he can catch me in time."

Jimmy Nicholl, back from Canada, should regain his place at right back and the only other change is likely to be another winger, Brotherston, of Blackburn Rovers coming in for Armstrong, who is injured. This means that the manager, Billy Bingham, will not abandon his aggressive. 4-2-4 aggressive. 4-2-4 Whether that proves a reckles philosophy away from home remains to be seen but Bingham, hoping for a repeat of the result be gained on his last trip to Turkey – a 3–0 win in Istanbul in 1968 Group six

Talk about not renewing Hand's contract when it expires after the players, among them Johnny Silcoy, am 18-year-old defender making his spring. As he himself acknowledged before last month's trip to Iceland: "We have to win our last three cames if I am to survive." The 3-0 victory in Reykjavik was apparently less convincing than the Wales prepare to enjoy their breathing space

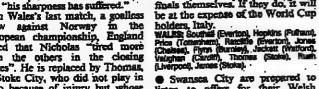

Wales can afford to feel a little elf-righteous tonight. Not for them the soul-searching and the live the soal-searching and the live television coverage; instead the knowledge that they need only tharpen their wits against Romania in Wrexham before their last two qualifying games in the European Championship.

A win either in Bulgaria on Qualification would be a reward for those attributes which the smaller of the teamwork and determination. It is therefore a surprise that Mike England, the Wales manager, has changed his team for tonight to the extent of dropping his captain, Peter Nicholas, The Arsenal midfield player, who has led his country in four of their last five internationals, is omitted, England says, because he is currently out if his club first team and "his sharpness has suffered."

In Wales's last match, a goalless draw against Norway in the European championship, England noted that Nicholas "tired more than the others in the closing stages". He is replaced by Thomas, of Stoke City, who did not play in Oslo because of injury but whose present form suggests that he does not even know what the word tired means. Flynn takes over the captaincy. The one change England Swansea's manager John Toshack might have been expected to make, said. A dream house built of granite

By Hugh Taylor If those eternal optimists, the bousands of Scottish supporters who will fill Hampden Park tonight hoping to see their team turn on football of Brazilian dazzle, had been listening to Jock Stein as he held court at his training head-quarters at Troon, they would have been disappointed.

It is not the glamour of the South Americans or the colourful patterns of the European Latins that appeals to the Scotland manager, the most pragmatical of tacticians, "I would pragmatical of tacticians. "I would rather", he said, "that we could play like the Belgians".

To most people the play of Scotland's opponents at Hampden in the European Championship match may appear to be drab, a minor-key fugue in keeping with the Low Countries' temperament. But not so Stein, who considers Belgium to be the outstanding team in Europe and wants Scotland to take a few lessons from them.

Europe and wants Scotland to take a few lessons from them.

They have, he insists, something he would dearly love; and he sums up Belgium's success formula in two words; consistency and continuity. How right he is, For Stein adds ruefully: "It makes me sad to think of some of our recent poor results—all the more so when you consider of some of our recent poor results— all the more so when you consider that in practically every game we played we had great spells. "The Belgians, on the other hand, are fully committed for 90 minutes are fully committed for 90 minutes and they have acheived continuity in their selections. That is something we must aim for, particularly as Belgium, like ourselves, are a small country". Tonight, then, may be considered a new start for the manager whose eye is firmly fixed on the next World Cup.

What he wants is not so much a

What he wants is not so much a victory, although that would be sweet over opponents who have beaten Scotland in their last four fannes, but a workmanlike per-formance which will justify the same side being chosen again for the next international against East Germany next month.

With the World Cup draw only weeks away, Stein is determined to have his squad as ready and settled as possible. Apart from Souness, who is absent because of injury, the Scotland team are probably the most powerful the manager could field. Scotland find relief in the fact that the defence, whose fragility caused so many heartaches, now appears much more redoubtable, thanks to the granite qualities of the heartaches, thanks to the granite qualities of the ship any Bolish country can produce.

But as Stein says, there can be no more severe test than the Belgians, who will not finalize their team until near the kick-off because, if Switzerland beat East Germany in the afternoon, Belgium would require one point to be sure of qualifying for the European finals.

Yet the Scotland team appeal to the supporters and, is view of the the supporters and, in view of the supporters and, in view of the way they played in narrowly losing in Belgium last December, they should have no fear of their opponents, consistent, fast and strong as they undoubtedly are.

Cochrane to appeal

ern Ireland international winger Terry Cochrane, who is currently or loan to Gillingham, will appear against a club line of two week's wages at a League management committee hearing in Liverpool on Friday. Malcohn Allison, the Middlesbrough manager, punished Cochrane for what he described as an "obscene gesture" in a Central league match against Coventry City reserves last month.

Derek Statham, the West Bron wich Albion full-back, has had further setback in his fight to recover from a groin injury. Statham, who has not played in the first team this season, came through a reserve game last Friday, but has broken down again in training and has now been ordered a week's rest with only light training to follow.

Martyn Bennett is fit to return to the Albion defence against Man-chester United on Saturday, bow-ever, and Ken McNaught and Cyrille Regis are both to resume training.

Tests for drugs on Olympic triallists

American athletes competing in Olympic trials will undergo mandatory drug testing and face disqualification from the 1984 Games if they do not pass, the United States Olympic committee officials have said.

In some cases, drug-testing crews will show up unannounced at other athletic events besides the Olympic trials, according to Don Millar, executive director of the US Olympic committee. "We must clean this programme up once and for all." Mr Miller said at a news conference at U.S. Olympic headquarters here.

The testing programme was launched as a result of events at the Pan-American Games in August when 16 athletes were found to have illegal substances in their systems, which ranged from eye drops to anabolic steroids. They were stripped of any medals and records registered at the Pan-American Games, Mr Miller said that the new programme will feature both voluntary testing, which for Olympic trials.

Mr Miller added that the programme was designed to assist our athletes. The bottom line is that drugs are harmful to the individual. Those who take drugs and win are winning unfairly, and that goes to the heart of morality in sports."

However, the court would not interfere with the exercise of that discretion, provided that the secretary of state complied with the procedural rules and the requirements of natural justice which. among other things, required him to notify the other interested parties of any such representations which he was proposing to consider and to invite them to respond to them.

The commung strength of the pound in Europe is still acting as an incentive for the British to purchase. 'leisure homes in-currency-weak France, Portugal and Spain. The frenetic activity following the lifting of exchange control regulations some four years ago has stabilized since the June election as the potential purchaser became well aware that there is not going to be a sudden clampdown on currency movement. Undoubtedly during the rest of the year and well into spring, 1984 is going to be a buyer's market with most major developers in the south of France, Algarve and Costa del Sol concentrating on the UK buyer. The escudo was last devalued

by 12 per cent - in June this year; the peseta is being weakened by rumours of a further devaluation; while the French franc at 11.8 to the pound has caused property prices on some holiday complexes in the south to come into line with similar developments in Marbella.

● John Tuse's TIMEWATCH (BBC2 8.10pm) keeps up its high atendard of interest with the diverting tale of both East and West Germany's attempts to promote the 15th-century priest and academic, Martin Luther, as the shiring example of what those two opposites stand for. East Germany, especially, has had to swallow hard because Luther had been branded as a class traitor for years only to be spectacularly rehabilitated a decade ago as the first of the bourgeoise revolutionaries and one of the greatest men in German history. Reporter Bernard Clark asks a stoneyfaced Siegified Rakotz, chairman of the Martin Luther Committee of East Committee se of East Germany, a

CHOICE with amusing results while Professor Helico Oberman of Tubingen University gives the reasons why Luther is feled in As a contrast to the legal levity of lest night's Rumpole episode this evening offers a critical examination of the present state of the British judiciery. Twenty Twenty Vision's JUDGE FOR YOURSELF (Channel 4 8.30pm) includes interviews with establishment figures detending the highly secretive procedures of judicial appointment and younger barristers who believe that the time is ripe for a more open system of appointments to the judiciary. Former High Court Judge, Sir Neil Lawson, tormer Old Balley Judge, Alan King-Hamilton and eminent QC George Carman defend the present system of appointment as best they can but they agree that judges are generally appointed by the 'old boy network' and not by ability.

Cuotes from judges in recent cases tend to underline that point. Unfortunately, the person best able to comment on the criticisms, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hallsham, declined to take part in the programme. A pity. Joan Morgan presents a delightful, off-beat, programme IN PRAISE OF OLDER APPLES (Radio 3 7.00pm) in which she muses on the reasons for Britain's passion for the fruit.

Israelis greet austerity with panic buying spree

From Christopher Walker Jerusalem

Israel's bubble of superficial prosperity burst painfully yesterday when the new right-wing government of Mr Yitzhak Shamir enforced a 23 per cent devaluation and a sweeping package of austerity measures in an effort to halt the rapid economic decline.

The agreement on the draconian moves followed a stormy all-night immediately after ministers had drunk a formal toast to the new

Monday with a 60-33 majority. The urgent need to solve an economic crisis regarded as the most serious in Israel's history has presented the 68-year old Mr Shamir with a supreme test of his skills as a coalition manager. It has also threatened a clash with the trade unions, which are opposed to government attempts to weaken the link between wage rises and the inflation rate: a Within an hour of the measures being broadcast over Israel Radio. supermarkets were besieged in a wave of panic buying designed to beat the 50 per cent cut in subsidies on all basic commodities at midnight. Mr Britten the Home Secretary, had arrived in Blackpool to make the most difficult public appearance of his career. He had to reply to 2 debate on law and order amid seemingly uncontrollable gos-sip and innuendo that for years he had been hving an amazing double life as a Thatcherite and wet.

Until the June election he had held the post of Chief Secretary to the Treasury, a job where, according to his critics he could easily hide his wetness by occasionally de-manding the closume of an old folks' home or curbing the rate of increase in the sum going to the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden. But when he became Home Secretary after the election, it proved impossible for him to prevent the truth coming out. He had to deal with criminals; his apparent lack of any impact on their activities proved in the eyes of the party Desperately, he tried to live what they would regard as a normal life. In the Commons vote on capital punishment in July, he was for hanging - but only for terrorists.

The adverse criticism of him in the party continued unabated throughout the summer and autumn. The Prime Minister made it.

clear that Mr Brittan's difficulties with the party over the law and order were a parely private matter.

And so to yesterday's debate, whereupon moderation reared its head, sided perhaps by the party's har-dened conference managers. When the time came for him to rise, Mr Brittan was able to say the debate had been "sober, thoughtful, re-sponsible and balanced" - in

A much warmer ovation went to Mr Geol Parkinson and he was not even yet in town. He turned up in the speech of his successor as chairman, Mr John Sclwyn Gummer, to be thanked for his conduct at the election

The Christian, decent Mr Gummer was put up to take the party's mind of sex. Mention of Mr Parkinson brought cheers and applause for half a minute. Those who had hoped for a display of Tory hypocrisy in the Parkin-son affair were confounded for the time being and, we must hope, for ever.

So too were those who thought that Mr Parkinson should resign on the odd ground of his remaining with his wife and children.

But one cannot resist a mischievous, sociological reflection. -Mr Parkinson is being forgiven because what so many outsiders do not realize is that adultery is to the Tory Home Counties what Rugby Union football is to Mr Kinnock's south Wales, a tough, raw, sentimental physical contact sport - almost a
